By the statements just made it has already been indicated in what close connection Gen stands with the subsequent books of the sacred Scriptures. The history of the chosen people, which begins with Ex 1 ff, at the very outset and with a clear purpose, refers back to the history as found in Gen (cf Ex 1 1–6.8 with Gen 46 27; 50 24 ff; and see EXODUS, I, 3), although hundreds of years had elasped between these events; which years are ignored, because they were in their details of no importance for the religious history of the people of God. But to Abraham in Gen 12 1–3 the promise had been given, not only that he was to be the father of a mighty nation that would recognize him as their founder, and the earliest history of which is reported in Ex and the following books of the Pent, but also that the Holy Land had been promised him. In this respect, the Book of Josh, which gives the story of the capture of this land, is also a continuation of the historical development begun in Gen. The blessing of God pronounced over Abraham, however, continued to be efficacious also in the later times among the people who had descended from him. In this way Gen is an introduction to all of the books of the OT that follow it, which in any way have to do with the fate of this people, and originated in its midst as the result of the special relation between God and this people. But in so far as this blessing of God was to extend to all the nations of the earth (12 3), the promises given can be entirely fulfilled only in Christ, and can expand only in the work and success of Christian missions and in the blessings that are found within Christianity. Accordingly, this book treats first of beginnings and origins, in which, as in a kernel, the entire development of the kingdom of God down to its consummation is contained (cf VI below).

3. Connection with Succeeding Books

II. The Composition of Genesis in General.—The tōlᵉdhōth.—The fact that Gen is characterized by a far-reaching and uniform scheme has, at least in outline, been already indicated (see I, 2 and 3). This impression is confirmed when we examine matters a little more closely and study the plan and structure of the book. After the grand introitus, which reports the creation of the world (1 1—2 3) there follows in the form of 10 pericopes the historical unfolding of that which God has created, which pericopes properly in each case bear the name tōlᵉdhōth, or "generations." For this word never signifies creation or generation as an act, but always the history of what has already been created or begotten, the history of generations; so that for this reason, 2 4*a*, where mention is made of the tōlᵉdhōth of heaven and of earth, cannot possibly be a superscription that has found its way here from 1 1. It is here, as it is in all cases, the superscription to what follows, and it admirably leads over from the history of creation of the heavens and the earth in ch 1 to the continuation of this subject in the next chapter. The claim of the critics, that the redactor had at this place taken only the superscription from his source P (the priestly narrator, to whom 1—2 3 is ascribed), but that the section of P to which this superscription originally belonged had been suppressed, is all the more monstrous a supposition as 2 4*a* throughout suits what follows.

1. Unity of the Biblical Text

(1) Only on the ground of this correct explanation of the term tōlᵉdhōth can the fact be finally and fully explained, that the tōlᵉdhōth of Terah contain also the history of Abraham and of Lot; the tōlᵉdhōth of Isaac contain the history of Jacob and Esau; the tōlᵉdhōth of Jacob contain the history of Joseph and his brethren. The ten tōlᵉdhōth are the following: I, 2 4—4 26, the tōlᵉdhōth of the heavens and the earth; II, 5 1—6 8, the tōlᵉdhōth of Adam; III, 6 9—9 29, the tōlᵉdhōth of Noah; IV, 10 1—11 9, the tōlᵉdhōth of the sons of Noah; V, 11 10–26, the tōlᵉdhōth of the sons of Shem; VI, 11 27—25 11, the tōlᵉdhōth of Terah; VII, 25 12–18, the tōlᵉdhōth of Ishmael; VIII, 25 19—35 29, the tōlᵉdhōth of Isaac; IX, 36 1—37 1, the tōlᵉdhōth of Esau (the fact that 36 9, in addition to the instance in ver 1, contains the word tōlᵉdhōth a second time, is of no importance whatever for our discussion at this stage, as the entire chapter under any circumstances treats in some way of the history of the generations of Esau; see III, 2 9); X, 37 2—50 26, the tōlᵉdhōth of Jacob. In each instance this superscription covers everything that follows down to the next superscription.

The number 10 is here evidently not an accidental matter. In the arts. EXODUS, LEVITICUS, DAY OF ATONEMENT, also in EZEKIEL, it has been shown what rôle the typical numbers 4, 7, 10 and 12 play in the structure of the whole books and of the individual pericopes. (In the NT we meet with the same phenomenon, particularly in the Apocalypse of St. John; but compare also in Matthew's Gospel the 3×14 generations in 1 1 ff, the 7 parables in 13 1 ff, the 7 woes in 23 13 ff.) In the same way the entire Book of Lev naturally falls into 10 pericopes (cf LEVITICUS, II, 2, 1), and Lev 19 contains 10 groups, each of 4 (possibly also of 5) commandments; cf possibly also 18 6–18; 20 9–18; see LEVITICUS, II, 2, 21, VI. Further, the number 10, with a greater or less degree of certainty, can be regarded as the basis for the construction of the pericopes: Ex 1 8—7 7; 7 8—13 16 (10 plagues); 13 17—18 27 (see EXODUS, II, 2 1–3); the Decalogue (20 1 ff); the first Book of the Covenant (21 1—23 13; 23 14–19), and the whole pericope 19 1—24 18*a*, as also 32 1—35 3 (see EXODUS, II, 2, 4, 6). In the Book of Gen itself cf further the 10 members from Shem to Abraham (11 11–26), as also the pericopes 25 19—35 29; 37 2—50 26 (see III, 2, 8, 10 below), and the 10 nations in Gen 15 19 ff. And just as in the cases cited, in almost every instance, there is to be found a further division into 5×2 or 2×5 (cf, e.g. the two tables of the Decalogue); thus, too, in the Book of Gen in each case, 5 of the 10 pericopes are more closely combined, since I–V (tōlᵉdhōth of Shem inclusive) stand in a more distant, and VI–X (treating of the tōlᵉdhōth of Terah, or the history of Abraham) in a closer connection with the kingdom of God; and in so far, too, as the first series of tōlᵉdhōth bring into the foreground more facts and events, but the second series more individuals and persons. Possibly in this case, we can further unite 2 tōlᵉdhōth; at any rate I+II (the primitive age), III+IV (Noah and his sons), VII+VIII (Ishmael and Isaac), IX+X (Esau and Jacob) can be thus grouped.

(2) Further indication of unity.—In addition to the systematic scheme so transparent in the entire Bib. text of the Book of Gen, irrespective of any division into literary sources, it is to be noticed further, that in exactly the same way the history of those generations that were rejected from any connection with the kingdom of God is narrated before the history of those that remained in the kingdom of God and continued its development. Cain's history (4 17 ff) in J stands before the history of Seth (4 25 f J; 5 3 ff P); Japheth's and Ham's genealogy (10 1 ff P; 10 8 ff P+J) before that of Shem (10 21 ff J+P), although Ham was the youngest of the three sons of Noah (9 24); the further history of Lot (19 29 ff P+J) and of Ishmael's genealogy (25 12 ff P+J) before that of Isaac (25 19 ff P+J+E); Esau's descendants (36 1 ff R+P) before the tōlᵉdhōth of Jacob (37 2 ff P+J+E).

In favor of the unity of the Bib. text we can also mention the fact that the Book of Gen as a whole, irrespective of all sources, and in view of the history that begins with Ex 1 ff, has a unique character, so that e.g. the intimate communion with God, of the kind which is reported in the beginning of this Book of Gen (cf, e.g. 3 8; 7 16; 11 5 J; 17 1.22; 35 9.13 P; 18 1 ff; 32 31 J), afterward ceases; and that in Ex, on the other hand, many more miracles are reported than in the Book of Gen (see Exodus, III, 2); that Gen contains rather the history of mankind and of families, while Ex contains that of the nation (see I, 2 above); that it is only in Ex that the law is given, while in the history of the period of the patriarchs we find only promises of the Divine grace; that all the different sources ignore the time that elapses between the close of Gen and the beginning of Ex; and further, that nowhere else is found anything like the number of references to the names of persons or things as are contained in Gen (cf, e.g. 2 23; 3 20; 4 1.25, etc, in J; 17 5.15.17–20, etc, in P; 21 9.17.31, etc, in E; 21 6; 27 36, etc, in J+E; 28 19, etc, in R; 49 8.16.19, etc, in the blessing of Jacob); that the changing of the names of Abram and Sarai to Abraham and Sarah from 17 5.15 goes on through all the sources, while before this it is not found in any source. Finally, we would draw attention to the psychologically finely drawn portraits of Bib. persons in Gen. The fact that the personal pronoun hūʾ and the noun naʿar are used of both masc. and fem. genders is characteristic of Gen in common with all the books of the Pent, without any difference in this regard being found in the different documents, which fact, as all those cited by us in number 1 above, militates against the division of this book into different sources. Let us now examine more closely the reason assigned for the division into different sources.

2. Rejection of the Documentary Theory

(1) In general.—(a) Statement of the theory: OT scholars of the most divergent tendencies are almost unanimous in dividing the Bib. text of Gen into the sources P, J and E, namely Priest Codex, Jahwist, and Elohist. To P are attributed the following greater and connected parts: 1 1—2 4*a;* 5; a part of the story of the Deluge in chs 6–9; 11 10 ff; 17; 23; 25 12 ff; 35 22*b* ff; the most of 36. As examples of the parts assigned to J we mention 2 4*b*—4 26; the rest of the story of the Deluge in chs 6–9; 11 1 ff; 12 f; 16; 18 f, with the exception of a few verses, which are ascribed to P; ch 24 and others. Connected parts belonging to E are claimed to begin with chs 20 and 21 (with the exception of a number of verses which are attributed to P or J or R), and it is thought that, beginning with ch 22, E is frequently found in the history of Jacob and of Joseph (25 19—50 26), in part, however, interwoven with J (details will be found under III, in each case under 2). This documentary theory has hitherto been antagonized only by a few individuals, such as Klostermann, Lepsius, Eerdmans, Orr, Wiener, and the author of the present article.

(b) Reasons assigned for the customary division into sources: As is well known, the theory of a separation of certain books of the OT into different sources began originally with the Book of Gen. The use made of the two names of God, namely Jehovah and Elohim, caused Astruc to conclude that two principal sources had been used in the composition of the book, although other data were also used in vindication of the theory; and since the days of Ilgen the conviction gained ground that there was a second Elohist (now called E), in contradistinction to the first (now called P, to whom, e.g., Gen 1 is ascribed). This second Elohist, it was claimed, also made use of the name Elohim, as did the first, but in other respects he shows greater similarity to the Jahwist. These sources were eventually traced through the entire Pent and into later books, and for this reason are discussed in detail in the art. Pentateuch. In this article we must confine ourselves to the Book of Gen, and limit the discussion to some leading points. In addition to the names for God (see under 2), it is claimed that certain contradictions and duplicate accounts of the same matters compel us to accept different sources. Among these duplicates are found, e.g., Gen 1 1—2 4*a* P, and 2 4*b* ff J, containing two stories of creation; Gen 12 9 ff J; 20 1 ff E; 26 1 ff J; with the narrative of how Sarah and Rebekah, the wives of the two patriarchs, were endangered; chs 15 J and 17 P, with a double acccount of how God concluded His covenant with Abraham; 21 22 ff E and 26 12 ff J, the stories of Abimelech; chs 16 J and 21 E, the Hagar episodes; 28 10 ff J+E and 35 1 ff E+P, the narratives concerning Bethel, and in the history of Joseph the mention made of the Midianites E, and of the Ishmaelites J, who took Joseph to Egypt (37 25 ff; 39 1); the intervention of Reuben E, or Judah J, for Joseph, etc. In addition a peculiar style, as also distinct theological views, is claimed for each of these sources. Thus there is found in P a great deal of statistical and systematic material, as in 5 1 ff; 11 10 ff; 25 12 ff; 36 6 ff (the genealogies of Adam, Shem, Ishmael, Esau); P is said to show a certain preference for fixed schemes and for repetitions in his narratives. He rejects all sacrifices earlier than the Mosaic period, because according to this source the Lord did not reveal himself as Jeh previous to Ex 6 1 ff. Again, it is claimed that E describes God as speaking to men from heaven, or through a dream, and through an angel, while according to J Jeh is said to have conversed with mankind personally. In regard to the peculiarities of language used by the different sources, it is impossible in this place to enumerate the different expressions, and we must refer for this subject to the different Introductions to the OT, and to the commentaries and other literature. A few examples are to be found under (c) below, in connection with the discussion of the critical hypothesis. Finally, as another reason for the division of Gen into different sources, it is claimed that the different parts of the sources, when taken together, can be united into a smooth and connected story.

The documents, it is said, have in many cases been taken over word for word and have been united and interwoven in an entirely external manner, so that it is still possible to separate them and often to do this even down to parts of a sentence or to the very words.

(c) Examination of the documentary theory: (α) Style and peculiarities of language: It is self-evident that certain expressions will be repeated in historical, in legal, and in other sections similar in content; but this is not enough to prove that there have been different sources. Whenever J brings genealogies or accounts that are no less systematic than those of P (cf 4 17 ff; 10 8 ff; 22 20–24); or accounts and repetitions occur in the story of the Deluge (7 2 ff.7 ff; or 7 4.12.17; 8 6; or 7 4; 8 8.10.12), this is not enough to make the division into sources plausible. In reference to the linguistic peculiarities, it must be noted that the data cited to prove this point seldom agree. Thus, e.g. the vb. bārā', "create," in Gen 1 1 is used to prove that this was written by P, but the word is found also in 6 7 in J. The same is the case with the word rᵉk̄hūsh, "possession," which in 12 5; 13 6; 36 7 is regarded as characteristic of P, but in 14 11 f.16.21 is found in an unknown source, and in 15 14 in J. In 12 5; 13 12*a;* 16 3; 17 8 it is said that 'ereç kᵉna'an, "land of Canaan," is a proof that this was written by P; but in chs 42, 44 f, 47, 50 we find this expression in J and E, in Nu 32 32 in J (R); cf also Nu 33 40 (PR) where Nu 21 1–3 (JE) is quoted; shiphḥāh, "maid servant," is claimed as a characteristic word of J in contrast to E (cf 16 1 ff); but in 16 3; 29 24.29 we find this word not only in P but in 20 14; 30 4.7.18; in E Mīn, "kind," is counted among the marks of P (cf e.g. 1 11 ff), but in Dt 14 13.14.18 we find it in Dt; rather remarkably, too, in the latest find on the Deluge made by Hilprecht and by him ascribed to 2100 BC. Cf on this subject my book, Wider den Bann der Quellenscheidung, and Orr, POT, ch vii, sec. vi, and ch x, sec. i; perhaps, too, the Concordance of Mandelkern under the different words. Even in the cases when the characteristic peculiarities claimed for the sources are correct, if the problem before us consisted only in the discovery of special words and expressions in the different sources, then by an analogous process, we could dissect and sever almost any modern work of literature. Particularly as far as the pieces are concerned, which are assigned to P, it must be stated that Gen 1 and 23 are, as far as style and language are concerned, different throughout. Gen 1 is entirely unique in the entire OT. Ch 23 has been copied directly from life, which is pictured with exceptional fidelity, and for this reason cannot be claimed for any special source. The fact that the story of the introduction of circumcision in ch 17 in many particulars shows similarities to the terminology of the law is entirely natural. The same is true when the chronological accounts refer one date to another and when they show a certain typical character, as is, e.g., the case also in the chronological parts of any modern history of Israel. On the other hand, the method of P in its narratives, both in matter and in form, becomes similar to that of J and E, just as soon as we have to deal with larger sections; cf 28 1 ff; 35 9 ff; 47 5 ff, and all the more in Ex and Nu.

Against the claim that P had an independent existence, we must mention the fact of the unevenness of the narratives, which, by the side of the fuller accounts in chs 1, 17 and 23, of the genealogies and the story of the Deluge, would, according to the critics, have reported only a few disrupted notices about the patriarchs; cf for this in the story of Abraham, 11 27.31 f; 12 4*b* f; 13 6*a*.11*b*.12*a;* 16 1*a*.3.15 f; 19 29; 21 1*b*.2*b*–5; 25 7–11*a;* and in its later parts P would become still more incomprehensible on the assumption of the critics (see III below). No author could have written thus; at any rate he would not have been used by anybody, nor would there have been such care evinced in preserving his writings.

(β) The alleged connection of matter: The claim that the different sources, as they have been separated by critics, constitute a compact and connected whole is absolutely the work of imagination, and is in conflict with the facts in almost every instance. This hypothesis cannot be consistently applied, even in the case of the characteristic examples cited to prove the correctness of the documentary theory, such as the story of the Deluge (see III, 2, in each case under [2]).

(γ) The biblico-theological data: The different Bib. and theological data, which are said to be characteristic in proof of the separation into sources, are also misleading. Thus God in J communes with mankind only in the beginning (Gen 2 f; 7 16 ff; 11 5; 18 f), but not afterward. In the beginning He does this also, according to P, whose conception of God, it is generally claimed, was entirely transcendental (cf 17 1.22; 35 9.13). The mediatorship of the Angel of Jeh is found not only in E, (21 17, 'Ĕlōhīm), but also in J (16 7.9–11). In 22 11 in E, the angel of Jeh (not of the 'Ĕlōhīm) calls from heaven; theophanies in the night or during sleep are found also in J (cf 15 12 ff; 26 24; 28 13–16; 32 27). In the case of P, the cultus-theory, according to which it is claimed that this source does not mention any sacrifices before Ex 6 1 ff, is untenable. If it is a fact that the theocracy, as it were, really began only in Ex 6, then it would be impossible that P would contain anything of the cultus before Ex 6; but we have in P the introduction of the circumcision in ch 17; of the Sabbath in 2 1 ff; and the prohibition against eating blood in 9 1 ff; and in addition the drink offerings mentioned in 35 14, which verse stands between vs 13 and 15, and, ascribed to P, is only in the interests of this theory attributed to the redactor. If then the theory here outlined is not tenable as far as P is concerned, it would, on the other hand, be all the more remarkable that in the story of the Deluge the distinction between the clean and the unclean (7 2 ff.8) is found in J, as also the savor of the sacrifice, with the term rēᵃḥ ha-nīḥōᵃḥ, which occurs so often in P (cf Gen 8 21 with Nu 15 3.7.10.13 f.24; 18 17); that the sacrifices are mentioned in 8 20 ff, and the number 7 in connection with the animals and days in 7 4; 8 8.10.12 (cf in P, e.g. Lev 8 33; 13 5 f.21.26 f.31.33.50.54; 14 8 f.38 f; 14 7.51; 16 14 f; Nu 28 11; 29 8, etc); further, that the emphasis is laid on the 40 days in 7 4.12.17; 8 6 (cf in P, Ex 24 1–8; Lev 12 2–4; Nu 13 25; 14 34), all of which are ascribed, not as we should expect, to the Levitical P, but to the prophetical J. The document P, which, according to a large number of critics, was written during the Exile (see e.g. LEVITICUS, III, 1, or EZEKIEL II, 2) in a most surprising manner, instead of giving prominence to the person of the high priest, would then have declared that kings were to be the greatest blessings to come to the seed of Abraham (17 6.16); and while, on the critical assumption, we should have the right to expect the author to favor particularistic tendencies, he, by bringing in the history of all mankind in Gen 1–11, and in the extension of circumcision to strangers (17 12.23), would have displayed a phenomenal universality. The strongest counter-argument against all such minor and incorrect data of a Bib. and a theological character will always be found in the uniform religious and ethical spirit and world of thought that pervade all these sources, as also in the unity in the accounts of the different patriarchs, who are pictured in such a masterly, psychological and consistent manner, and who could never be the result of an accidental working together and interweaving of different and independent sources (see III below).

(δ) Duplicates: In regard to what is to be thought of the different duplicates and contradictions, see below under III, 2, in each case under (2).

(ε) The manner in which the sources are worked together: But it is also impossible that these sources could have been worked together in the manner in which the critics claim that this was done. The more arbitrarily and carelessly the redactors are thought to have gone to work in many places in removing contradictions, the more incomprehensible it becomes that they at other places report faithfully such contradictions and permit these to stand side by side, or, rather, have placed them thus. And even if they are thought not to have smoothed over the difficulties anywhere, and out of reverence for their sources, not to have omitted or changed any of these reports, we certainly would have a right to think, that even if they would have perchance placed side by side narratives with such enormous contradictions as there are claimed to be, e.g. in the story of the Deluge in P and J, they certainly would not have woven these together. If, notwithstanding, they still did this without harmonizing them, why are we asked to believe that at other places they omitted matters of the greatest importance (see III, 2, 3)? Further, J and E would have worked their materials together so closely at different places that a separation between the two would be an impossibility, something that is acknowledged as a fact by many OT students; yet, notwithstanding, the contradictions, e.g. in the history of Joseph, have been allowed to stand side by side in consecutive verses, or have even intentionally been placed thus (cf, e.g. 37 25 ff). Then, too, it is in the nature of things unthinkable that three originally independent sources for the history of Israel should have constituted separate currents down to the period after Moses, and that they could yet be dovetailed, often sentence by sentence, in the manner claimed by the critics. In conclusion, the entire hypothesis suffers shipwreck through those passages which combine the peculiarities of the different sources, as e.g. in 20 18, which on the one hand constitutes the necessary conclusion to the preceding story from E (cf ver 17), and on the other hand contains the name Jehovah; or in 22 14 ff, which contains the real purpose of the story of the sacrificing of Isaac from E, but throughout also shows the characteristic marks of J; or in 39 1, where the so-called private person into whose house Joseph has been brought, according to J, is more exactly described as the chief of the body-guard, as this is done by E, in 40 2.4. And when the critics in this passage appeal to the help of the redactor, this is evidently only an ill-concealed example of a "begging of the question." In ch 34, and esp. in ch 14, we have a considerable number of larger sections that contain the characteristics of two or even all three sources, and which accordingly furnish ample evidence for protesting against the whole documentary theory.

(ζ) Criticism carried to extremes: All the difficulties that have been mentioned grow into enormous proportions when we take into consideration the following facts: To operate with the three sources J, E and P seems to be rather an easy process; but if we accept the principles that underlie this separation into sources, it is an impossibility to limit ourselves to these three sources, as a goodly number of OT scholars would like to do, as Strack, Kittel, Oettli, Dillmann, Driver. The stories of the danger that attended the wives of the Patriarchs, as these are found in Gen 12 9 ff and in 26 1 ff, are ascribed to J, and the story as found in Gen 20 1 ff to E. But evidently two sources are not enough in these cases, seeing that similar stories are always regarded as a proof that there have been different authors. Accordingly, we must claim three authors, unless it should turn out that these three stories have an altogether different signification, in which case they report three actual occurrences and may have been reported by one and the same author. The same use is made of the laughter in connection with the name Isaac in 17 17; 18 12; 21 6, viz. to substantiate the claim for three sources, P and J and E. But since 21 9 E; 26 8 J also contain references to this, and as in 21 6 JE, in addition to the passage cited above, there is also a second reference of this kind, then, in consistency, the critics would be compelled to accept six sources instead of three (Sievers accepts at least 5, Gunkel 4); or all of these references point to one and the same author who took pleasure in repeating such references. As a consequence, in some critical circles scholars have reached the conclusion that there are also such further sources as J^1 and J^2, as also E^1 and E^2 (cf Budde, Baudissin, Cornill, Holzinger, Kautzsch, Kuenen, Sellin). But Sievers has already discovered five subordinate sources of J, six of P, and three of E, making a total of fourteen independent sources that he thinks can yet be separated accurately (not taking into consideration some remnants of J, E and P that can no longer be distinguished from others). Gunkel believes that the narratives in Gen were originally independent and separate stories, which can to a great extent yet be distinguished in their original form. But if J and E and P from this standpoint are no longer authors but are themselves, in fact, reduced to the rank of collectors and editors, then it is absurd to speak any more of distinct linguistic peculiarities, or of certain theological ideas, or of intentional uses made of certain names of God in J and E and P, not to say anything of the connection between these sources, except perhaps in rare cases. Here the foundations of the documentary theory have been undermined by the critics themselves, without Sievers or Gunkel or the other less radical scholars intending to do such a thing. The manner in which these sources are said to have been worked together naturally becomes meaningless in view of such hypotheses. The modern methods of dividing between the sources, if consistently applied, will end in splitting the Bib. text into atoms; and this result, toward which the development of OT criticism is inevitably leading, will some day cause a sane reaction; for through these methods scholars have deprived themselves of the possibility of explaining the blessed influence which these Scriptures, so accidentally compiled according to their view, have achieved through thousands of years. The success of the Bible text, regarded merely from a historical point of view, becomes for the critic a riddle that defies all solutions, even if all dogmatical considerations are ignored.

(2) Rejection of documentary theory in view of the names for God.—(a) An error of the hypothesis in principle: The names of God, Jehovah and Elohim, constituted for Astruc the starting-point for the division of Gen into different sources (see [1] above). Two chief sources, based on the two names for God, could perhaps as a theory and in themselves be regarded as acceptable. If we add that in Ex 6 1 ff, in P, we are told that God had not revealed Himself before the days of Moses by the name of Jehovah, but only as "God Almighty," it seems to be the correct thing to separate the text, which reports concerning the times before Moses and which in parts contains the name Jehovah, into two sources, one with Jehovah and the other with Elohim. But just as soon as we conclude that the use made of the two names of God proves that there were three and not two sources, as is done from Gen 20 on, the conclusive ground for the division falls away. The second Elohist (E), whom Ilgen was the first to propose (see [1] above), in principle and a priori discredits the whole hypothesis. This new source from the very outset covers all the passages that cannot be ascribed to the Jehovah or the Elohist portions; whatever portions contain the name Elohim, as P does, and which nevertheless are prophetical in character after the manner of J, and accordingly cannot be made to fit in either the Jahwistic or the Elohistic source, seek a refuge in this third source. Even before we have done as much as look at the text, we can say that according to this method everything can be proved. And when critics go so far as to divide J and E and P into many subparts, it becomes all the more impossible to make the names for God a basis for this division into sources. Consistently we could perhaps in this case separate a Jehovah source, an Elohim source, a ha-'Ĕlōhīm source, an 'Ēl Shadday source, an 'Ădhōnāy source, a Mal'akh Yahweh source, a Mal-'akh 'Ĕlōhīm source, etc, but unfortunately these characteristics of the sources come into conflict in a thousand cases with the others that are claimed to prove that there are different sources in the Book of Gen.

(b) The false basis for the hypothesis: But the basis of the whole hypothesis itself, viz. Ex 6 1 ff P, is falsely regarded as such. If Jehovah had really been unknown before the days of Moses, as Ex 6 1 ff P is claimed to prove, how could J then, in so important and decisive a point in the history of the religious development of Israel, have told such an entirely different story? Or if, on the other hand, Jehovah was already known before the time of Moses, as we must conclude according to J, how was it possible for P all at once to invent a new view? This is all the more incredible since it is this author and none other who already makes use of the word Jehovah in the composition of the name of the mother of Moses, namely Jochebed (cf Ex 6 20 and Nu 26 59). In addition, we do not find at all in Ex 6 1 ff that God had before this revealed Himself as 'Ĕlōhīm, but as 'Ēl Shadday, so that this would be a reason for claiming not an 'Ĕlōhīm but an 'Ēl Shadday source for P on the basis of this passage (cf 17 1; 28 3; 35 11; 48 3 P—43 14 E! cf also 49 25 in the blessing of Jacob). Finally, it is not at all possible to separate Ex 6 1 ff P from that which immediately precedes, which is taken from JE and employs the name Jehovah; for according to the text of P we do not know who Moses and who Aaron really were, and yet these two are in Ex 6 1 ff regarded as well-known persons. The new revelation of God in Ex 6 1 ff (P) by the side of 3 1 ff (JE and E) is also entirely defensible and rests on a good foundation; for Moses after the failure of Ex 5 needed such a renewed encouragement (see Exodus II, 2, 1). If this is the case, then the revelation of the name of Jehovah in Ex 6 1 ff cannot mean that that name had before this not been known at all, but means that it had only been relatively unknown, i.e. that in the fullest and most perfect sense God became known only as Jehovah, while before this He had revealed His character only from certain sides, but esp. as to His Almighty Power.

(c) Improbability that the difference in the use of the names for God is without significance: In view of the importance which among oriental nations is assigned to names, it is absolutely unthinkable that the two names Jehovah and Elohim had originally been used without any reference to their different meanings. The almost total omission of the name Jehovah in later times or the substitution of the name Elohim for it in Pss 42–83 is doubtless based in part on the reluctance which gradually arose in Israel to use the name at all; but this cannot be shown as probable for older times, in which it is claimed that E was written. In the case of P the rule, according to which the name Elohim is said to have been used for the pre-Mosaic period, and the reason for the omission of Jehovah would have been an entirely different one. Then, too, it would be entirely inexplicable why J should have avoided the use of the name Elohim. The word Elohim is connected with a root that signifies "to fear," and characterizes God from the side of His power, as this is, e.g., seen at once in Gen 1. Jehovah is splendidly interpreted in Ex 3 14 ff, and the word is connected with the archaic form hāwāh for hāyāh, "to be," and the word characterizes God as the being who at all times continues to be the God of the Covenant, and who, according to Gen 2 4—3 24, can manifestly be none other than the Creator of the universe in Gen 1 1—2 3, even if from Gen 12 on He, for the time being, enters into a special relation to Abraham, his family and his people, and by the use of the combined names Jehovah-Elohim is declared to be identical with the God who created the world, as e.g. this is also done in the section Ex 7 8—13 16, where, in the 10 plagues, Jehovah's omnipotent power is revealed (cf Exodus, II, 2, 2); and in 9 30 it is charged against Pharaoh and his courtiers, that they did not yet fear Jehovah-Elohim, i.e. the God of the Covenant, who at the same time is the God of the universe (cf also 1 K 18 21.37.39; Jon 4 6).

(d) Real purpose in the use of the names for God: But now it is further possible to show clearly, in connection with a number of passages, that the different names for God are in Gen selected with a perfect consciousness of the difference in their meanings, and that accordingly the choice of these names does not justify the division of the book into various sources.

(a) Decreasing use of name Jehovah: The fact that the tōl^{e}dhōth of Terah, of Isaac, and of Jacob begin with the name Jehovah but end without this name. In the history of Abraham are to be noted the following passages: 12 1.4.7.8.17; 13 4.10.13.14.18; 14 22; 15 1.2.8; 16 2.5–7.9.10.11.13; 17 1; in the history of Isaac: 25 21.22.23; 26 2.12.22.24.25.28.29; and in the tōl^{e}dhōth of Jacob 38 7.10; 39 2.3.5. In these passages the beginnings are regularly made with the name Jehovah, although with decreasing frequency before the name Elohim is used, and notwithstanding that in all these sections certain selections from P and E must also be considered in addition to J. Beginning with Gen 12, in which the story of the selection of Abraham is narrated, we accordingly find emphasized, at the commencement of the history of each patriarch, this fact that it is Jehovah, the God of the Covenant, who is determining these things. Beginning with Gen 40 and down to about Ex 2 we find the opposite to be the case, although J is strongly represented in this section, and we no longer find the name Jehovah (except in one passage in the blessing of Jacob, which passage has been taken from another source, and hence is of no value for the distinction of the sources J, E and P; this is the remarkable passage Gen 49 18). In the same way the story of Abraham (25 1–11) closes without mention being made of the name of Jehovah, which name is otherwise found in all of these histories, except in ch 23 (see below). The tōl^{e}dhōth of Isaac, too, use the name Jehovah for the last time in 32 10; and from this passage down to 37 2 the name is not found. It is accordingly clear that in the history of the patriarchs there is a gradual decrease in the number of times in which the name Jehovah occurs, and in each case the decrease is more marked; and this is most noticeable and clearest in the history of Joseph, manifestly in order to make all the more prominent the fact that the revelation of God, beginning with Ex 3 1 ff, is that of Jehovah. These facts alone make the division of this text into three sources J, E and P impossible.

(β) Selection of the names of God with reference to the approach of man to God and of his departure from God: The fact, further, that the approach of an individual to God or his departure from God could find its expression in the different uses made of the names of God is seen in the following. In connection with Ishmael and Lot the name Jehovah can be used only so long as these men stood in connection with the kingdom of God through their relation to Abraham (cf 16 7.9.10.11.13 and 13 10; 19 13 f.16), but only the name Elohim can be used as soon as they sever this connection (cf 21 12.17. 19.20 and 19 29). On the other hand, Elohim is used in the beginning of the history of the Gentile Abimelech (20 3.6.11.13.17; 21 22 f); while afterward, when he has come into closer relations to the patriarchs, the name Jehovah is substituted (26 28. 29). A similar progress is found in separate narratives of the patriarchs themselves, since in 22 1 ff and ch 28 the knowledge of Elohim is changed into that of Jehovah (cf 22 1.3.9 with 22 11.14.15.16, and 28 12 with 28 13.16).

(γ) Selection of the names for God for other reasons: Elohim can, further, in many cases be explained on the basis of an implied or expressed contrast, generally over against men (cf 22 8.12; in the second of these two passages the fear of God is placed in contrast to godlessness); 30 2; 31 50; 32 2 f; cf with vs 4 and 8; 32 29; 35 5; or on the basis of an accommodation to the standpoint of the person addressed, as in 3 1–5 (serpent); 20 3.6. 11.13.17; 23 6; 39 9 (Gentiles); or on the basis of grammar, as in 23 6; 32 3; 28 17.22; because the composition with the proper name Jehovah could never express the indefinite article (a prince of God, a camp of God, a Bethel or house of prayer); or finally in consequence of the connection with earlier passages (cf 5 1 ff with ch 1; 21 2.4; 28 3 ff; 35 9 ff with ch 17). A comparison of these passages shows that, of course, different reasons may have induced the author to select the name Elohim, e.g. 23 6; 28 12; 32 12.

(δ) Systematic use of the names of God, particularly in the history of Abraham: That the names for God are systematically used is finally attested by the fact that in the history of Abraham, after the extensive use of the name Jehovah in its beginning (see above under [α]), this name is afterward found combined with a large number of other and different names; so that in each case it is Jehovah of whom all further accounts speak, and yet the name of Jehovah is explained, supplemented and made clear for the consciousness of believers by the new appellations, while the full revelation of His being indeed begins only in Ex 3 and 6 1 ff, at which place the different rays of His character that appeared in earlier times are combined in one brilliant light. The facts in the case are the following. In the story of Abraham, with which an epoch of fundamental importance in the history of revelation begins, we find Jehovah alone in 12 f. With the exception of ch 23, where a characteristic appellation of God is not found, and 25 1–11, where we can claim a decadence in the conception of the Divinity (concerning 23 6; 25 11; see above [γ]+[α]), the name of Jehovah is retained in all of these stories, as these have been marked out (III, 2, 6); but beginning with ch 14 they do not at all use any longer only one name for God. We here cite only those passages where, in each case, for the first time a new name for God is added, viz. 14 18, 'Ēl ʽElyōn; 14 19, Creator of heaven and of earth; 15 2, 'Ădhōnāy; 16 7, the Angel of Jehovah; 16 13, the God that seeth; 17 1, 'Ēl Shadday; 17 3, 'Ĕlōhīm; 17 18, hā-'Ĕlōhīm; chs 18 f, special relation to the three men (cf 18 2 and 19 1); 18 25, the Judge of the whole earth; 20 13, 'Ĕlohim constructed as a pl.; 21 17, the Angel of God; 24 3, the God of heaven and the God of the earth; 24 12, the God of Abraham.

(e) Lack and weakness in the materials needed to prove the case: If we add, finally, that to prove the hypothesis we are limited to the meager materials found in Gen 1 1—Ex 6 1 ff; that in this comparatively small number of chapters Gen 40 to Ex 2 cannot be utilized in this discussion (see above under [d] [α]); that all those passages, in which J and E are inseparably united must be ignored in this discussion; that all other passages in which J and E are often and rapidly interchanged from the very outset are suspiciously akin to begging the question; that Gen 20 18, which with its "Jehovah" is ascribed to R, is absolutely needed as the conclusion of the preceding Elohim story; that in 21 33 with its "Jehovah" in J, on the other hand, the opening Elohim story from E, which is necessary for an explanation of the dwelling of Abraham in the south country, precedes; that the angel of Jehovah (22 11) is found in E; that 2 4—3 24 from J has besides Jehovah the name Elohim, and in 3 1*b*–5 only Elohim (see above); that in 17 1; 21 1 P Jehovah is found; that 5 29, which is ascribed to J, is surrounded by portions of P, and contains the name Jehovah, and would be a torso, but in connection with ch 5 P, in reality is in its proper place, as is the intervening remark (ver 24 P); that, on the other hand, in 4 25; 6 2.4; 7 9; 9 27; 39 9 Elohim is found—in view of all these facts it is impossible to see how a greater confusion than this could result from the hypothesis of a division of the sources on the basis of the use made of the names of God. And then, too, it is from the very outset an impossibility, that in the Book of Gen alone such an arbitrary selection of the names for God should have been made and nowhere else.

(f) Self-disintegration of the critical position: The modern critics, leaving out of consideration entirely their further dissection of the text, themselves destroy the foundation upon which this hypothesis was originally constructed, when Sievers demands for Gen 1 (from P) an original Jehovah-Elohim in the place of the Elohim now found there; and when others in Gen 18 f J claim an original Elohim; and when in 17 1—21 1 the name Jehovah is said to have been intentionally selected by P.

(g) Different uses in the LXX: Naturally it is not possible to discuss all the pertinent passages at this place. Even if, in many cases, it is doubtful what the reasons were for the selection of the names for God, and even if these reasons cannot be determined with our present helps, we must probably, nevertheless, not forget that the LXX in its tr of Gen in 49 passages, according to Eerdman's reckoning, and still more according to Wiener's, departs from the use of the names for God from the Heb original. Accordingly, then, a division of Gen into different sources on the basis of the different names for God cannot be carried out, and the argument from this use, instead of proving the documentary theory, has been utilized against it.

III. The Structure of the Individual Pericopes.—In this division of the article, there is always to be found (under 1) a consideration of the unity of the Bib. text and (under 2) the rejection of the customary division into different sources.

The conviction of the unity of the text of Gen and of the impossibility of dividing it according to different sources is strongly confirmed and strengthened by the examination of the different pericopes. Here, too, we find the division on the basis of the typical numbers 4.7.10.12. It is true that in certain cases we should be able to divide in a different way; but at times the intention of the author to divide according to these numbers practically compels acceptance on our part, so that it would be almost impossible to ignore this matter without detriment, esp. since we were compelled to accept the same fact in connection with the articles Exodus (II); Leviticus (II, 2); Day of Atonement (I, 2, 1), and also Ezekiel (I, 2, 2). But more important than these numbers, concerning the importance or unimportance of which there could possibly be some controversy, are the fundamental religious and ethical ideas which run through and control the larger pericopes of the tōlᵉdhōth of Terah, Isaac and Jacob in such a way that it is impossible to regard this as merely the work of a redactor, and we are compelled to consider the book as the product of a single writer.

1. Structure of the Proœmium

The structure of the proœmium (Gen 1 1—2 3) is generally ascribed to P. Following the introduction (vs 1.2; creation of chaos), we have the creation of the seven days with the Sabbath as a conclusion. The first and the second three days correspond to each other (1st day, the light; 4th day, the lights; 2d day, the air and water by the separation of the waters above and the waters below; 5th day, the animals of the air and of the water; 3d day, the dry land and the vegetation; 6th day, the land animals and man; cf also in this connection that there are two works on each day). We find Ex also divided according to the number seven (see Exodus, II, 1; cf also Ex 24 18*b*—31 18; see Exodus, II, 2, 5, where we have also the sevenfold reference to the Sabbath idea in Ex, and that, too, repeatedly at the close of different sections, just as we find this here in Gen); and in Lev cf chs 23, 25, 27; see Leviticus, II, 2, 2; the VIII, IX, and appendix; and in Gen 4 17 ff J; 5 1–24 P; 6 9—9 29; 36 1—37 1 (see under 2, 1.2.3.9).

The ten tōlᵉdhōth are found in Gen 2 4—50 26.

1. The tōlᵉdhōth of the heavens and the earth (2 4—4 26):

2. Structure of the Ten Tōlᵉdhōth

(1) The Biblical text.—(a) 2 4–25, Paradise and the first human beings; (b) 3 1–24, the Fall; (c) 4 1–16, Cain and Abel; (d) 4 17–26, the Cainites, in seven members (see under 1 above) and Seth. The number 4 appears also in 5 1—6 8 (see under 2); 10 1—11 9 (see under 4); and esp. 11 27—25 11 (under 6). Evidently (a)+(b) and (c)+(d) are still more closely connected.

(2) Rejection of the division into sources (1 1—2 4*a* P and 2 4*b*—4 26 J).—Ch 2 does not contain a new account of creation with a different order in the works of creation. This section speaks of animals and plants, not for their own sakes, but only on account of their connection with man. The creation of the woman is only a further development of ch 1. While formerly the critics divided this section into 2 4—4 26 J, they now cut it up into J^1 and J^2 (see under II, 2, 1 [c] [ζ]), because, they say, the tree of life is mentioned only in 2 9 and 3 23, while in 2 17 and 3 3 ff the Divine command is restricted to the tree of knowledge of good and evil. But it is impossible to see why there should be a contradiction here, and just as little can we see why the two trees standing in the midst of the garden should not both have had their significance (cf 2 9; 3 3). It is further asserted that a division of J is demanded by the fact that the one part of J knows of the Fall (6 9 ff), and the other does not know of such a break in the development of mankind (4 17 ff). But the civilization attained by the Cainites could certainly have passed over also to the Sethites (see also 6 2); and through Noah and his sons have been continued after the Deluge. Then, too, the fact that Cain built a city (4 17), and the fact that he became a fugitive and a wanderer (4 12), are not mutually exclusive; just as the beginnings made with agriculture (4 12) are perfectly consistent with the second fact.

2. The tōlᵉdhōth of Adam (5 1—6 8):

(1) The Biblical text.—(a) 5 1–24, seven generations from Adam to Lamech (see under 1, and Jude ver 14); (b) 5 25–32, four generations from the oldest of men, Methuselah, down to the sons of Noah; (c) 6 1–4, intermingling of the sons of God and the sons of men; (d) 6 5–8, corruption of all mankind. Evidently at this place (a)+(b) and (c)+(d) correspond with each other.

(2) Rejection of the division into sources (ch 5 P with the exception of ver 29 [see II, 2, 2 (e)]; 5 29; 6 1–8 J).—6 7 J presupposes ch 1 P; as, on the other hand, the fact that the generations that, according to ch 5 P, had in the meanwhile been born, die, presupposes the advent of sin, concerning which only J had reported in ch 3. In the case of P, however, in 1 31 it is said that everything was very good.

3. The tōlᵉdhōth of Noah (6 9—9 29):

(1) The Biblical text.—Seven sections (see 1 above) viz: (a) 6 9–22, the building of the ark; (b) 7 1–9, entering the ark; (c) 7 10–24, the increase of the Flood; (d) 8 1–14, the decrease of the Flood; (e) 8 15–19, leaving the ark; (f) 8 22—9 17, declaration of a covenant relation between God and Noah; (g) 9 18–29, transfer of the Divine blessing upon Shem.

(2) Rejection of the division into sources (7 1–5.7–10.12.16*b*.17.22 f; 8 2*b*.3*a*.6–12.13*b*.20–22; 9 20–27 J, the rest from P).—In all the sources are found the ideas that the Deluge was the punishment of God for sin; further, the deliverance of the righteous Noah and his wife and three sons Shem, Ham and Japheth and their wives; the deliverance of the different kinds of animals; the announcement of the covenant relations between God and mankind after the Deluge; the designation of the Deluge with the term mabbūl and of the ark with tēbhāh. In the Bab account, which without a doubt stands in some connection with the Bib., are found certain measurements of the ark, which in the Bible are only in P, as also the story of the sending out of the birds when the flood was decreasing, and of the sacrifices of those who had been delivered, which in the Bible are said to be found only in J; and these facts are a very powerful argument against the division into sources. Further, P, in case the critics were right, would have contained nothing of the thanks of Noah for his deliverance, although he was a pious man; and in the case of J we should not be informed what kind of an ark it was into which Noah was directed to go (7 1 ff); nor how he can already in 8 20 build an altar, as he has not yet gone out of the ark; and, further, how the determination of Jeh, that He would not again curse the earth but would bless it, can be a comfort to him, since only P has reported concerning the blessing (9 1 ff). Even if the distinction is not always clearly made between clean and unclean animals, and different numbers are found in the case of each (6 19 f; 7 14–16 P, over against 7 2 f in J), yet this is to be regarded merely as a lack of exactness or, perhaps better, rather as a summary method of procedure. The difficulties are not even made any easier through the separation into sources, since in 7 8 f in J both numbers and the distinction between the two kinds of animals are used indiscriminately. Here, too, in J we find the name Elohim used. The next contradiction that is claimed, namely that the Deluge according to J lasted only 61 days, and is arranged in 40 days (7 4.12.17; 8 6) plus 3×7 =21 days (8 8.10.12), while in P it continues for 1 year and 11 days (7 11.24; 8 3–5.14), is really a self-inflicted agony of the critics. The report of the Bible on the subject is perfectly clear. The rain descends for 40 days (7 12 J); but as in addition also the fountains of the deep are broken up (7 11 P), we find in this fact a reason for believing that they increased still more (7 24 P and 7 17 J). The 40 days in 8 6 J cannot at all be identified with those mentioned in 7 17; for if this were the case the raven would have been sent out at a time when the waters had reached their highest stage, and even according to J the Deluge covered the entire world. In general see above, II, 2, 1 (c) (γ).

4. The tōlᵉdhōth of the sons of Noah (10 1—11 9):

(1) The Biblical text.—(a) 10 2–5, the Japhethites; (b) 10 6–20, the Hamites; (c) 10 21–32, the Shemites; (d) 11 1–9, the Bab confusion of tongues. Evidently (a) to (c) is to be regarded as in contrast to (d) (cf also 11 1.9 J in addition to 10 32 P).

(2) Rejection of the division into sources (10 1–7.20.22 f.31 f P, the rest belonging to J).—The distribution of ch 10 between P and J is actually ridiculous, since in this case J does not speak of Japheth at all, and the genealogy of the Hamites would connect directly with P, a phenomenon which must have been repeated in vs 24 ff. The Jewish Midr, in addition, and possibly correctly, counts 70 peoples (cf 46 27; Ex 1 5; Nu 11 16.25; Lk 10 1).

5. The tōlᵉdhōth of Shem (11 10–26): 10 generations (see under II, 1).

6. The tōlᵉdhōth of Terah (11 27—25 11):

(1) The Biblical text.—After the introduction (11 27–32), the theme of the history of Abraham is given in 12 1–4*a* (ver 1, the promise of the holy land; ver 2, promise of many descendants; ver 3, announcement of the double influence of Abraham on the world; ver 4*a*, the obedience of Abraham's faith in his trust upon the Divine promise). In contrast to the first three thoughts which characterize God's relation to Abraham, the fourth is placed, which emphasizes Abraham's relation to God (see under [d]). But both thoughts give complete expression to the intimate communion between God and Abraham. On the basis of these representations, which run through the entire story and thus contribute materially to its unification, this section can also be divided, as one of these after the other comes into the foreground. These four parts (12 4*b*—14 24; 15 1—18 15; 18 16—21 34; 22 1—25 11) can each be divided again into four subdivisions, a scheme of division that is found also in Ex 35 4—40 38; Lev 11–15, 16 (cf Exodus, II, 2, 7; Leviticus, II, 2, 2, III and IV; Day of Atonement, I, 2, 1), and is suggested by Dt 12-26 (cf also my book, Wider den Bann der Quellenscheidung, the results of the investigation of which work are there reproduced without entering upon the details of the argument).

(a) 12 4*b*—14 24, in which the reference to the promised land is placed in the foreground; see 12 1, and the passages and statements in parentheses in the following: (α) 12 4*b*–8, Abraham's journey to Canaan (vs 5 P, 6.7.8 J); (β) 12 9—13 4, descent to Egypt from Canaan, and return (12 9.10; 13 1–4J); (γ) 13 5–18, separation from Lot (vs 6 P, 7.9 J, 12*a* P, 14 f.17.18 J); (δ) ch 14, expedition against Chedorlaomer, etc (Abraham is blessed by the priest-king of the country, and receives as homage from the products of the country bread and wine [vs 18 f], while he in return gives tithes [ver 20]). The division of this section (12 4*b*—14 24) is to be based on the similarity of the closing verses (12 8; 13 4; 13 18).

(b) 15 1—18 15, unfolding of the promise of descendants for Abraham by this announcement that he is to have a son of his own; cf 12 2 and what is placed in parentheses in the following: (α) ch 15, Jeh's covenant with Abraham (vs 2.3 JE, 4 J, 5 E, 13.14.16.18 J). The promise is not fulfilled through Eliezer, but only through an actual son (vs 3.4); (β) 16 1–16, Hagar gives birth to Ishmael as the son of Abraham. Hagar's son, too, namely Ishmael, is not the genuine heir, notwithstanding the connection between 16 10 and 12 2 (cf 17 18–20 P); (γ) ch 17 P, promise of the birth of Isaac given to Abraham (vs 2–17.19.21); (δ) 18 1–15, Sarah also hears that Isaac is promised (vs 10.12–15).

(c) 18 16—21 34, the double influence of Abraham on the world; cf 12 3 and what is in parentheses in the following: (α) 18 16—19 38, the pericope dealing with Sodom; (i) 18 16–33, Abraham's petition for the deliverance of Sodom; (ii) 19 1–11, the sin of the Sodomites, while Lot shows some of the characteristics of Abraham; (iii) 19 12–28, story of the destruction, in connection with which Lot receives the benefit of his relation to Abraham (vs 16.19.21.22); (iv) Lot ceases to be a part of this history after this destruction; (β) 20 1–18, Abraham with Abimelech (vs 6.9 E, 18 R, punishment; vs 7.17, intercession); (γ) 21 1–21, Ishmael ceases to be part of this history (vs 13.18. 20 E); (δ) 21 22–34, Abraham's agreement with Abimelech (the latter seeks Abraham's friendship and fears his enmity, vs 27.23 E).

(d) 22 1—25 11 ff, Abraham's faith at its culminating point; cf 12 4*a* and what is in parentheses in the following: (α) 22 1–19, the sacrifice of Isaac (vs 2.12 E, 16.18 R); (β) ch 23, purchase of the place to bury the dead, which act was the result of his faith in the promised land; (γ) ch 24 is introduced by 22 20–24, which has no independent character. With the twelve descendants of Nahor cf the twelve sons of Jacob, the twelve of Ishmael (25 12 ff; 17 20), and on the number 12 see Ex 24 18—30 10, under Exodus, II, 2, 5; Lev 1–7 under Leviticus, II, 2, 2, i, and under Ezekiel, I, 2, 2. Ch 24 itself contains the story of how a wife was secured for Isaac from among his relatives (the faith in the success of this plan is transmitted from Abraham to his servant); (δ) 25 1–11, the sons of the concubine of Abraham (J+R) cease to be a part of this history; transfer of the entire inheritance to the son of promise (J); burial in the ground bought for this purpose (P) (all of these concluding acts stand in close connection with Abraham's faith). In reference to the force of the names of God in connecting Gen 11 27—25 11, see above under II, 2, 2 (d).

(2) Rejection of the division into sources (11 27.31 f; 12 4*b*.5; 13 6*a*.11*b*.12*a*; 16 1*a*.3.15 f; 17; 19 29; 21 1*b*. 2*b*–5; 23; 25 7–11*a* P; 14 from an unknown source; 15 6; 20 1–17; 21 8–32; 22 1–13.19 E; 15 1–3; 21 6 JE; 20 18; 22 14–18; 25 6 R; all else belongs to J).—Through the passages ascribed to P breaks are caused in the text of J in 11 28 f; 12 4*a* (Lot); in ch 16, where the conclusion is lacking; in 18 1 (the reference of the pronoun); in 24 67 (Sarah's death); in 25 1 ff (no mention of Abraham's death). On the other hand P presupposes the text of J in 11 31 f; 12 4*b*; 16 1*b*; 19 29. In the case of E we need mention only the abrupt break in 20 1; and, finally, the text of P, leaving out of consideration the larger sections (chs 17 and 23), is entirely too meager to constitute an independent document.

We will here discuss also the so-called duplicates (see under II, 2, 1, a+c, δ). The different stories concerning the danger in which the wives of Abraham and Isaac were involved in 12 9 ff J; 20 1 ff E; 26 1 ff J directly presuppose each other. Thus in 20 13 E Abraham regards it as a fact that such situations are often to be met with, and consequently the possibility of an occurrence of such an event could not have appeared so remarkable to an Oriental as it does to a modern critic; ch 26 1 suggests the story in 12 9 ff. The words used here also show that the three stories in question did not originate independently of each other (cf 26 7; 20 5; 12 19—26 7; 20 11; 12 12—26 10; 20 9; 12 18—26 3; 20 1; 12 10 [gūr]; see under II, 2, 1, c, ζ). The two Ishmael pericopes (chs 16 J+P+21 E) differ from each other throughout, and, accordingly, are surely not duplicates. The two stories of the conclusion of a covenant in chs 15 J and 17 P are both justified, esp. since in 17 7 the author speaks of an "establishment" of the covenant which already existed since ch 15. Ch 17 P+18 1 ff J are certainly intended to be pendants, so that it is impossible to ascribe them to different authors; cf the analogous beginning of the theophanies of Jeh in 17 1 and 18 1 (even the pronoun referring to Abraham in 18 1 J, unless taken in connection with ch 17 P, is without any context), also the laughing of Abraham and of Sarah (17 17; 18 12 f; see under II, 2, 1 [c] [ζ]), the prominence given to their age (17 17; 18 11 f), and the designation of the time in 17 11; 18 10.14.

Nor can we quote in favor of a division into sources the passage 21 14 f E, on the ground that Ishmael is described here as being so small that he could be laid upon the shoulder of his mother and then be thrown by her under a shrub, while according to the Bib. text he must have been 15 years of age (16 16; 21 5 P). For the original does not say that he was carried on her shoulders; and in Mt 15 30 it is even said of adults that they were thrown down. On the other hand, also according to E, Ishmael could not have been so small a child, for in 21 18*b* he is led by the hand, and according to ver 9 he already mocks Isaac, evidently because the latter was the heir of the promise.

Sarah's age, too, according to ch 20 E, does not speak in favor of a division into sources. That she was still a beautiful woman is not claimed here.

Evidently Abimelech was anxious only for a closer connection with the powerful Abraham (cf 21 23. 27). Then, too, all the sources ascribe an advanced age to Sarah (cf 21 6 J+E; 18 12 f J; 17 17 P).

7. The tōlᵉdhōth of Ishmael (25 12–18): 12 princes descended from Ishmael (see under 6 [d] [γ]).

8. The tōlᵉdhōth of Isaac (25 19—35 29): The correct conception of the fundamental thought can be gained at once in the beginning of this section (25 22 f): Jeh's oracle to Rebekah, that the older of the twins, with whom she was pregnant, should serve the younger; also in Rom 9 10 ff with reference to Mal 1 2 f; and finally, the constant reference made to Esau in addition to Jacob until the former ceases to be a factor in this history in ch 36. Accordingly in the end everything is made dependent on the one hand on Jacob's election, notwithstanding his wrongdoings, on the other hand, on Esau's rejection notwithstanding his being the firstborn, or in other words, upon the perfectly free grace of God; and all the different sources alike share in this fundamental thought. But in dividing between the different parts of this section, we must particularly draw attention to this, that in all of these parts both thoughts in some way or other find their expression.

(1) The Biblical text.—Containing 10 parts (see under II, 1), namely (a) 25 19–26, the birth of Esau and Jacob; (b) 25 27–34, Esau despises and loses his birthright; (c) 26 1–35, Isaac receives the blessing of Abraham, which afterward is transmitted to Jacob, while Esau, through his marriage with heathen women, prepares the way for his rejection (vs 34 f); (d) 27 1–40, Jacob steals the blessing of the firstborn; (e) 27 41–45, Jacob's flight out of fear of Esau's vengeance; (f) 27 46—28 9, Jacob is sent abroad out of fear of his brother's bad example; (g) 28 10—32 33, Jacob in a strange land and his fear of Esau, which is overcome in his contest of prayer in Peniel on his return: (α) 28 10–22, the ladder reaching to heaven in Bethel when he went abroad; (β) 29 1—30 43, twenty years with Laban (see 31 38); (γ) 31 1–54, Jacob's departure from Mesopotamia; (δ) 32 1–33, his return home; (h) ch 33, reconciliation with Esau, who returns to Seir (ver 16; cf 32 4), while Jacob becomes the owner of property in the Holy Land (vs 19 f); (i) 34 1—35 22, Jacob remains in this land, notwithstanding the slaughter made by his sons Simeon and Levi (cf 34 30; 35 5); the new appearance of God in Bethel, with a repetition of the story of the changing of Jacob's name, with which the story of Jacob's youth is closed, and which presupposes the episode at Bethel (cf 35 1.6*b*.9–15 with 28 10 ff), and which is not in contradiction with the first change in the name of Jacob in ch 32 (cf the twofold naming of Peter in Jn 1 43 and Mt 16 18). Esau is yet mentioned in 35 1.7, where there is a reference made to Jacob's flight before him; (j) 35 23–29, Jacob's 12 sons as the bearers of the promise; while Esau is mentioned only as participating in Isaac's burial, but inwardly he has no longer any part in the history of the kingdom of God, as is seen from ch 36, and in 32 4; 33 16 is already hinted at. In this section, too, evidently there are groups, each of two parts belonging together, namely (a)+(b) describing the earliest youth; (c)+(d) in which Isaac plays a prominent part; (e)+(f) both of which do not exclude but supplement each other in assigning the motives for Jacob's flight; (g)+(h) Jacob's flight and reconciliation; (i)+(j) Jacob both according to family and dwelling-place as the recognized heir of the promise.

(2) Rejection of the division into sources.—As 25 29 f 26*b*; 26 34 f; 27 46—28 9; 29 24.29; 31 18; 35 6*a*. 9–12.15; 35 22*b*–29; 36 6–30.40–43 are ascribed to P, it is clear that these are in part such ridiculously small extracts, that we should be justified in attributing them to a sensible author. The whole sojourn in Mesopotamia is ignored in P, according to the critics, except the brief notices in 29 24.29; 33 18. Further, the parts of the rest of the text cannot in many cases be dispensed with; as, e.g. we do not know in 25 26*b* who was born; nor in 26 34 f who Esau was; nor in 27 46 who Jacob was; nor in 29 24 who Laban was; nor in 29 24.29 in what connection and for what purposes Leah and Rachel are mentioned. P makes no mention of any promise given to Isaac, which is, however, presupposed in 35 12 and later in Ex 2 24. In 28 1 ff P is most closely connected with J (cf 12 1–3, the blessing of Abraham, and ch 24). It is, further, impossible to separate the sources E and J in ch 28 (ladder reaching to heaven); cf 28 10–12. 17 f.20–22 E, vs 13–16 J, ver 19, and the name of God in ver 21 R, and this proposed division actually becomes absurd in chs 29 f in the story of the birth of Jacob's children, which are said to be divided between the sources J and E.

9. The tōlᵉdhōth of Esau (36 1—37 1): In 7 divisions (see under 1), namely (a) 36 1–5 R, Esau's family; the different names for Esau's wives, as compared with 26 34 f; 28 7–9 P, are doubtless based on the fact that oriental women are apt to change their names when they marry; and the fact that these names are without further remark mentioned by the side of the others is rather an argument against the division into sources than for it; (b) 36 6–8, Esau's change of abode to Seir, which, according to 32 4; 33 14.16, already took place before Jacob's return. Only in case that Esau (35 29) would have afterward remained for a longer period in Canaan, could we think of a new separation in this connection. It is more probable that at this place all those data which were of importance in connection with this separation are once more given without any reference to their difference in point of time; (c) 36 9–14, Esau as the founder of the Edomites (in ver 9 the word tōlᵉdhōth is repeated from ver 1, while the narrative of the descendants of Esau begins only at this later passage in so far as these were from Seir; cf ver 9 with ver 5, and above, under II, 1); (d) 36 15–19, the leading line of the sons of Esau; (e) 36 20–30, genealogy of the original inhabitants of the country, mentioned because of their connection with Esau (cf ver 25 with ver 2); (f) 36 31–39, the elective kingdoms of Edom; (g) 36 40–43, the Edomites' chief line of descent, arranged according to localities. We have here accordingly geographical accounts, and not historical or genealogical, as in 36 15 ff. 20 ff (30); cf also vs 40.43, for which reason we find also names of women.

10. The tōlᵉdhōth of Jacob (37 2—50 26):

(1) The Biblical text.—The key to the history of Joseph is found in its conclusion, viz. in 50 14–21, in the confession of Joseph, in the light of his past, namely, that God has ended all things well; and in 50 22 ff, in his confidence in the fulfilment of the Divine promise in the lives of those God has chosen; cf also Ps 105 16 ff. According to the two viewpoints in 50 14–26, and without any reference to the sources, this whole pericope (37 2—50 15) is divided into two halves, each of five subdivisions, or a total of ten (see under II, 1). In the exact demonstration of this, not only the contents themselves, but also regard for the different names for God will often render good service, which names, with good effect, are found at the close and in harmony with the fundamental thought of the entire section, viz. (a) 37 2—39 6*a*, Joseph enters Potiphar's house (4 pieces, see under 6, 1, namely [α] 37 2–11, the hatred of the brethren, [β] 37 12–36, selling Joseph, [γ] 38 1 ff, the Jehovah-displeasing conduct in the house of Judah, cf 38 7.10, [δ] 39 1–6, Jeh's pleasure in Joseph, in contrast to [γ]); (b) 39 6*b*–23, Joseph is cast into prison, but Jeh was with him (vs 21.23); (c) 40 1—41 52, the exaltation of Joseph, which at the end esp. is shown by the naming of Ephraim and Manasseh as caused by God, but which for the present passes by the history of his family (4 pieces, viz. [α] 40 1, interpretation of the dreams of the royal officials, [β] 41 1–36, interpretation of the two dreams of Pharaoh, [γ] 41 37–46*a*, the exaltation of Joseph, [δ] 41 46*b*–52, Joseph's activity for the good of the country); (d) 41 55—46 7, Joseph becomes a blessing to his family; cf the promise of God to Jacob in Beersheba to be with him in Egypt in 46 2 ff with 45 6–9 (in four pieces, viz. [α] 41 53–57, the general famine, [β] 42 1–38, the first journey of the brothers of Joseph, [γ] 43 14—4 34, the second journey [in four subdivisions, (i) 43 1–14, the departure, (ii) 43 14–34, the reception by Joseph, (iii) 44 1–17, final trial of the brethren, (iv) 44 18–34, the intercession of Judah]; [δ] 45 1—46 7, Joseph makes himself known and persuades Jacob to come to Egypt); (e) 46 8—47 26, Joseph continues to be a blessing to his family and to Egypt (in 4 subdivisions, of which the 4th is placed in contrast to the first 3 exactly as this is done in 10 1—11 9 and 11 27—25 11, viz. [α] 46 8–27, list of the descendants of Jacob, [β] 46 28–34, meeting with Joseph, [γ] 47 1–12, Jacob in the presence of Pharaoh, [δ] 47 13–26, the Egyptians who have sold themselves and their possessions to Pharaoh laud Joseph as the preserver of their lives). From this point on the attention is now drawn to the future: (f) 47 27–31, Jacob causes Joseph to take an oath that he will have him buried in Canaan (cf ver 30 J with ch 23 P); in (e)+(f) there is also lacking a designation for God; (g) ch 48, Jacob adopts and blesses Ephraim and Manasseh (cf also the emphasis placed on the providential guidance of God in vs 8 f.11.15 f, esp. vs 16 and 20 ff); (h) 49 1–27, Jacob blesses his 12 sons and prophesies their future fate (here, 49 18, appears the name of Jeh, which had disappeared since ch 40; see under II, 2, 2 (d) (α), and other designations for God, vs 24 f); (i) 49 28–33, Jacob's death after he had again expressed the wish, in the presence of all his sons, that he should be buried in Canaan; (j) 50 1–13, the body of Jacob is taken to Canaan. In these 10 pericopes again we can easily find groups of two each, viz. (a)+(b), Joseph's humiliation (sold, prison); (c)+(d), Joseph becomes a blessing to Egypt and to his family; (g)+(h), blessing of the grandchildren and the sons of Jacob; (i)+(j), Jacob's death and burial; here too the name of God is lacking as in (e) and (f).

(2) Rejection of the division into sources.—Here, too, the separation of P from the rest of the text as a distinct source is untenable, since in the section from 37 2—46 34, after 37 2, only the following fragments are attributed to this source, viz. 41 46*a;* 46 6f (according to some also to ver 27). In the same way P abruptly sets in at 47 5.27*b;* 49 28*b*. Further, 48 3 ff knows nothing of Ephraim or Manasseh, of whom P reports nothing, so that 50 13 f are the only verses that could naturally connect with the preceding statements of P. In 47 5 ff P reports entirely in the manner of ordinary narratives, and there is no sign of any systematic arrangement. But the separation between J and E cannot be carried out either. In the first place, when these two sources are actually separated by the critics, innumerable omissions in the story arise, which we cannot at this place catalogue. The contradictions which are claimed to exist here are the products of the critics' imagination. It is claimed that according to J it is Judah who plays a prominent rôle, while according to E it is Reuben; but in 37 21 Reuben is mentioned by J, and the rôle played by Judah in ch 38 J is anything but creditable. Why cannot both of these brethren have played a prominent rôle, as this was also the case with Simeon (42 24.36; 43 14) and Benjamin (42 13.20.32 ff.36.38; 43 3 ff; 44; 45 14)? Just as little are the Midianites in 37 28.36 E and the Ishmaelites of 37 25.27.28; 39 1 J mutually exclusive or contradictory, since the Midianites in the Gideon story, too, in Jgs 7 f; 8 24 are called Ishmaelites (cf in the German the name Prager for traveling musicians, whether they are from Prague or not). In J it is further claimed that Joseph's master was a private gentleman (39 1 ff), while in E he was the captain of the bodyguard (40 3 f). But in this instance the documentary theory can operate only when it calls in the assistance of R in ch 39 1. The fact that in ch 39 1 the name of the nationality is added to that of the office, is explained on the ground of the contrast to the Ishmaelites who sold Joseph. Finally, it is claimed to have been caused by the combination of the different sources in such a way that Benjamin in 43 8.29; 44 30.31.33 J is described as a boy, but in 46 21, R or P, as the father of ten children. But evidently the author of ch 46 has in view the number 70 (cf ver 27; see Ex 1 5; Nu 11 16.25; Lk 10 1; Ex 15 27; Jgs 12 13; and in Gen 10 above, under 4,2); and for this reason, e.g. in ver 17, he mentions only one granddaughter of Jacob; and for this he mentions all of the descendants of Jacob, even those who were born later in Egypt, but who already, as it were, had come to Egypt in the loins of their fathers, according to the view of the author. It certainly would be remarkable if no more grandchildren had been born to Jacob in Egypt, since Nu 26 does not mention a single son of any of the sons of Jacob later than those reported in Gen 46. In 46 27 Joseph's sons, too, who were born in Egypt, are included in the list, entirely in harmony with Dt 10 22. For such an arrangement and adjustment of a genealogy cf the 3 × 14 generations in Mt 1. From this point of view no conclusions, as far as the documentary theory is concerned, can be drawn from the ten sons of Benjamin.

1. History of the Patriarchs: Gen 12–50

IV. The Historical Character.—(1) Unfounded attacks upon the historical character.—(a) Proofs from general dogmatic principles: In order to disprove the historical character of the patriarchs, the critics are accustomed to operate largely with general dogmatic principles, such as this, that no nation knows who its original founder was. In answer to this it can be said that the history of Israel is and was from the beginning to the end unique, and cannot be judged by the average principles of historiography. But it is then claimed that Abraham's entire life appears to be only one continuous trial of faith, which was centered on the one promise of the true heir, but that this is in reality a psychological impossibility. Over against this claim we can in reply cite contrary facts from the history of several thousands of years; and that, too, in the experience of those very men who were most prominent in religious development, such as Paul and Luther.

(b) Argument based on the time that elapsed between these events and their records: Secondly, critics emphasize the long period of time that elapsed between these events themselves and their first records, esp. if these records can be accredited to so late a period as the 9th or the 8th cent. BC. In consequence of this, it is claimed that much of the contents of Gen is myth or fable; and Gunkel even resolves the whole book into a set of unconnected little myths and fables. Over against this claim we can again appeal to the universal feeling in this matter. I do not think that it can be made plausible, that in any race fables and myths came in the course of time more and more to be accepted as actual facts, so that perchance we should now be willing to accept as historical truths the stories of the Nibelungenlied or Red Riding Hood. But this, according to the critics, must have been the case in Israel. Prophets accepted the story of the destruction of the two cities in the Jordan valley, as recorded in Gen 19, as correct (cf Am 4 11; Isa 1 9; 3 9; Hos 11 8); also Abraham as a historical person (Isa 29 22; 41 8; 51 1 ff; Mic 7 20; Jer 33 26; Ezk 33 24; and possibly Mal 2 15); then Isaac (Am 7 9.16; Jer 33 26); also Jacob (Hos 12 3 ff; Am 9 8; Jer 33 26); also Joseph (Am 5 6.15); and these prophets evidently thought that these events and persons were regarded as historical by the people in general. In the NT we can cite, for Abraham, Mt 3 9; Gal 3; 4 21 ff; Rom 4 9 ff; 9 7 ff; He 7 1 ff; 11 8 ff; Jas 2 21 ff, and esp. the words of Jesus in Mt 8 11; Lk 16 22 ff; Jn 8 52 ff; finally in Mt 22 31 f, the whole argument for the resurrection of the dead is without a foundation if the patriarchs are not historical personages. Over against this, there was no period in the history of Israel in which it can be shown that these stories of Gen were regarded only as myths. If these events were actual occurrences, then those things which the patriarchs experienced were so unique that these experiences were not forgotten for a long time. Then, too, we can also refer to the strength of the memory of those nations that were not accustomed to have written records of their history.

(c) Proofs from the Bible itself: Finally, the attempt has been made to discover in the Bible itself a pre-Mosaic stage in its ideas of man concerning God, which is claimed to contradict the higher development of Divine ideas in the patriarchs, for which purpose the critics appeal to Ezk 23 3.8; 20 7 ff; Josh 24 14 ff. But at these places it is evident that the idolatry of the people is pictured as apostasy. And when in Ex 6 2 ff the name of Jeh is as a matter of fact represented as something new, it is nevertheless a fact that in these very passages the revelation given is connected with the history of the patriarchs. The same is true of Ex 3 1 ff. The whole hypothesis that the religion before the days of Moses was polytheistic has not been derived from the Bible, but is interpreted into it, and ends in doing violence to the facts there recorded (cf my book, Die Entwicklung der alttestamentlichen Gottesidee in vorexilischer Zeit).

(d) Comparison with the religion of Arabia: The critics further compare the pre-Mosaic religion of Israel with the low grade of religion in Arabia in the 5th cent. after Christ; but in order to do this, they must isolate Israel entirely, since all the surrounding nations at the time of the Am Tab had attained to an altogether different and higher stage of religious development and civilization.

(2) Unsatisfactory attempts at explaining the patriarchal age.—(a) The explanation based on the "high places": In denying the historical character of the account of the patriarchs in Gen, the critics are forced to contrive some scheme in explanation of the existence of these stories, but in doing this they make some bad breaks. Thus, e.g., they say that the Israelites when they entered Canaan found there the high places of the heathen peoples; and since if they wanted to make use of these in the service of Jeh they must first declare them legitimate places of worship, this was done by inventing the history of the patriarchs, who long before this are said to have already consecrated all these places to the Jeh worship. But how is it possible on this supposition to explain the story of Joseph, which transpired in Egypt? Then, too, the reasons for the origin of the other stories of the patriarchs would be enshrouded in a remarkable mystery and would be of very inferior character. Again, it is nowhere declared in the passages of Gen that here come into consideration that they are reporting the beginnings of a permanent cultus when they give an account of how God appeared to the patriarchs or when they erected altars in His honor. And, finally, while it is indeed true that the cultus localities of the patriarchs are in part identical with those of later times (cf Bethel, Beersheba)—and this is from the outset probable, because certain places, such as hills, trees, water, etc, as it were, of themselves were suitable for purposes of the cultus—yet such an identification of earlier and later localities does not cover all cases. And can we imagine that a prophetical method of writing history would have had any occasion in this manner to declare the worship of calves in Bethel a legitimate service?

(b) Explanation based on dating back later events to earlier times: But we are further told that the pre-prophetic condition of affairs in Israel was in general dated back into the primitive period, and this was done in such a way that the character of Abraham was regarded as reproducing ideal Israel, and the character of Jacob the empirical Israel in the past; something that certainly is from the outset an odd speculation of too much learning! If this explanation is correct, what shall we then do with Isaac and Joseph? And why is the whole story of the condition of civilization pictured in Gen so entirely different from that of later times? And is Abraham really a perfect ideal? Is he not rather, notwithstanding his mighty faith, a human being of flesh and blood, who can even doubt (15 2 f; 17 17); who can make use of sinful means to realize the promise (ch 16, Hagar); who tells a falsehood, although for the best of purposes, viz., to protect his wife (12 9 ff), and for this reason must accept the rebuke of the heathen Abimelech (20 9 f)? In addition, Abraham is married to his half-sister (20 12), which, according to Dt 27 22; Lev 18 9. 11; 20 17, is forbidden with the penalty of death for the transgressor. In the same way Jacob, according to Gen 29 f, has two sisters as wives, which is also declared by Lev 18 18 to be a crime.

(c) The patriarchs as eponymous heroes: In the third place, it is said that the people have in the persons of the patriarchs made for themselves eponymous heroes. But why did they make so many at one time? In addition, Abraham cannot possibly be regarded as such a hero as Jacob or Israel is, and in exceptional cases also Isaac and Joseph (Am 7 9.16; 5 6.15). It is not correct to place genealogies like those in Gen 10 1 ff; 25 1 ff.13 ff on a level with the stories concerning the patriarchs. In the latter case we are dealing with individualities of pronounced character, who in the experiences of their lives represent great fundamental principles and laws in the kingdom of God—Abraham, the principle of the grace of God, to which faith on the part of man is the counterpart; Jacob, the principle of Divine election; Joseph, that of the providential guidance of life; while Isaac, it is true, when he becomes prominent in the history, evinces no independent character, but merely follows in the footsteps of Abraham (cf 26 1 ff.3 ff.15.18.24 ff), but is in this very imitative life pictured in an excellent way.

(d) Different explanations combined: If we combine two or more of these different and unsatisfactory attempts at an explanation of the history of the patriarchs, we must become all the more distrustful, because the outcome of this combination is such an inharmonious scheme.

(3) Positive reasons for the historical character of Genesis.—The individuality of the patriarchs as well as their significance in the entire development of the history of the kingdom of God, and their different missions individually; further, the truthful portraiture of their method of living, which had not yet reached the stage of permanent settlement; and, finally, the fact that the prophets, the NT and above all Jesus Himself regard their historical character as something self-evident (see [1*b*] above), make the conviction a certainty, that we must insist upon their being historical personages; esp., too, because the attacks on this view (see [1] above), as also the efforts to explain these narratives on other grounds (see [2] above), must be pronounced to be failures. To this we must add the following: If Moses were the founder of the religion of Israel, it would scarcely have been possible that a theory would have been invented and have found acceptance that robs Moses of this honor by the invention of the story of the patriarchs. Rather the opposite would be the case. Besides, this older revelation of God is absolutely necessary in order to make Moses' work and success intelligible and possible. For he himself expressly declares that his work is based on the promises of God given to the fathers. Through this connection with the older revelation it was possible for Moses to win the attention and the confidence of the people (cf Ex 2 24; 3 6.13 ff; 4 5; 6 3.8; 15 2; 32 13 f; 33 1; cf also my book, Die Entwicklung der alttestamentlichen Gottesidee in vorexilischer Zeit, 117 ff; and Strack, Genesis, 93 ff).

Individuality of patriarchs: In so far as the history of the patriarchs contains miracles, they are in perfect harmony with the entire character of sacred history (cf Exodus, III, 2); and as far as the number of miracles is concerned, there are in fact fewer reported in the days of the patriarchs than in the times of Moses. On the view that the history of the patriarchs, which is earlier than the period of Moses, was an invention and not history, the opposite condition of affairs could be expected. Leaving out of consideration the unsatisfactory instances cited under V, 2, below, there is to be found also in the Book of Gen absolutely no reference to indicate events of a later period, which would throw a doubt on the historical character of what is here reported. In every direction (e.g. in connection with the theophanies and the cultus worship), there is a noticeable progress to be seen in going from Gen to Ex, a fact which again is an important argument for the historical reliability of the contents of both books. Finally, we add the following. Ch 14 (the Chedorlaomer and the Melchizedek episodes) has through recent archaeological researches been brilliantly confirmed as far as the names are concerned, as also in reference to the political conditions of the times, the general historical situation and the chronology. In the same way the religious conditions of Egypt, as described in Gen 12, and in the entire history of Joseph, are so faithfully pictured that it is absolutely impossible to regard these accounts as the work of imagination. These accounts must be the outcome, on the part of the author, of a personal knowledge of these things and conditions, as they are absolutely correct, even to the details of the coloring.

2. Primitive History of Gen 1–11

(1) Prominence of the religious element.—In the primitive history as recorded in the opening chapters of Gen we must yet emphasize, more than is done elsewhere, that the chief interest for the Christian is found in the religious and moral teachings of this account; and that these teachings remain unshaken, even when chronological, historical, archaeological, physical, geographical or philological sciences would tempt us to reach negative conclusions. It is a wise thing, from the outset, not to be too timid in this direction, and to concede considerable liberty in this matter, when we remember that it is not the purpose of the Bible to give us scientific knowledge in scientific forms, but to furnish us with religious and ethical thoughts in a language which a childlike mind, that is open to Divine things, can understand.

(2) Carefulness as regards divergent results of scientific research.—On the other hand, it is right over against the so-called "results" of these different sciences to be very critical and skeptical, since in very many cases science retracts today what with a flourish of trumpets it declared yesterday to be a "sure" result of investigations; e.g. as far as the chronology is concerned, the natural and the historical sciences often base their computations on purely arbitrary figures, or on those which are constructed entirely upon conclusions of analogy, and are far from conclusive, if perchance the history of the earth or of mankind has not at all times developed at the same pace, i.e. has moved upward and downward, as e.g. a child in its earlier years will always learn more rapidly than at any later period of its life.

(3) Frequent confirmations of the Bible by science.—But finally the Holy Scriptures, the statements of which at this period are often regarded slightingly by the theologians, are regarded much more highly by men of science. This is done, e.g., by such scientists as Reinke and K. E. von Baer, who declare that Moses, because of his story of the creation, was a man of unsurpassed and unsurpassable scientific thought; or when many geological facts point to such an event as the Deluge in the history of the earth. The history of languages, as a whole and in its details, also furnishes many proofs for the correctness of Gen 10, and that chapter has further been confirmed in a most surprising manner by many other discoveries (cf the existence of Babel at a period earlier than Nineveh, and the colonizing of Assur by Babel). Then facts like the following can be explained only on the presupposition that the reports in Gen are correct, as when a Dutchman in the 17th cent. built an ark after the measurements given in Gen and found the vessel in every particular adapted to its purposes; and when today we again hear specialists who declare that the modern ocean sailing vessel is being more and more constructed according to the relative proportions of the ark.

(4) The superiority of the Bible over heathen mythologies.—Finally, the similarity of the Bib. and the Bab accounts of the creation and the Deluge, as these have been discovered by learned research (and we confine ourselves to these two most important reports)—although this similarity has been misinterpreted and declared to be hostile to the historical reliability and the originality of Gen 1 and 6–9—does not prove what critics claim that it does. Even if we acknowledge that the contents of these stories were extant in Babylon long before the days of Moses, and that these facts have been drawn from this source by Israel, there yet can be no question that the value of these accounts, the fact that they are saturated with a monotheistic and ethical spirit, is found only in Israel and has been breathed into them only by Israel. For the inner value of a story does not depend upon its antiquity, but upon its spirit. But even this conception of the matter, which is shared by most theologians, cannot satisfy us. When we remember how Bab mythology is honeycombed by the grossest superstition and heathenism, and that our ethical feelings are often offended by it in the most terrible manner, it is really not possible to see how such a system could have had any attraction for Israel after the Spirit, and how a man who thought as a prophet could have taken over such stories. If Israel has been a pathfinder in the sphere of religion, as is acknowledged on all hands, why do the critics always talk of their borrowing from others? And then, since similar stories are found also among other nations, and as the natural sciences are anything but a unit in hostility to the Bib. narratives, all these factors can find a satisfactory explanation only on the supposition that there existed an original or primitive revelation, and that in Israel this revelation was transmitted in its greater purity, while among the other nations it was emptied of its contents or was perverted. In this way the universality of these stories can be explained, as also the inferiority in character of similar stories among the other nations.

The particularly close connection that exists between the Bab and the Bib. versions of these stories is in perfect harmony with the fact that it was from Babylon that the dispersion of mankind set in. The purity of the Bib. tradition is further attested by the fact that it reports the actual history of all mankind (see under I, 2), while the mythologies of other nations are restricted nationally and locally, i.e. the beginnings of the history of the individual nations and the beginnings of the history of mankind are identical, and the earliest history is always reported as taking place in the native land of the people reporting it. The fact that in earlier times there prevailed in Babylon too a purer knowledge of God, which, however, steadily degenerated, is proved by many data, and esp. by the recently discovered fragment of a Deluge story, according to which the God who destroyed the world by the Flood and the God who delivered the one family is the same God, which is in perfect agreement with the Bible, but is in contradiction to the later Bab story. That in earlier times a purer conception of God prevailed, seems to be confirmed also by the experiences of the missionaries. Evolutionism, i.e. the development of a higher conception of God out of a lower, is nothing but an unproved theory, which at every step is contrary to actual facts. Cf also my book, Die Entwicklung der Gottesidee in vorexilischer Zeit, 129 ff, and Schmidt, Die babylonische Religion: Gedanken über ihre Entwicklung, a dissertation in which the fact that religion naturally degenerates is proved also as far as the Greeks, the Egyptians, the East Indians and the Chinese are concerned.

V. Origin and Authorship of Genesis

1. Connection with Mosaic Times

—That the Book of Gen stands in some kind of literary connection with the succeeding books of the Pent is generally acknowledged. But if this is the case, then the question as to the origin and the time of the composition of this whole body of books can be decided only if we take them all into consideration. In this article we have only to consider those facts which are found in Gen for the solution of this problem. It is self-evident that the conclusion we have reached with reference to the literary unity of the book is of great importance for this question (see under II and III above). The historical character of the book, as demonstrated under IV above, also speaks emphatically for this claim that the literary composition of the book must have taken place when the memory of these events was still trustworthy, and the impression and experiences were still fresh and had not yet faded. Such individualistic and vivid pictures of historical personages as are reported by Gen, such a faithful adherence to the accounts of the civilization in the different countries and districts and at different times, such detailed accounts of foreign customs, conditions and historical events, could scarcely have been possible, if the Mosaic age with its powerful new impressions, the period of the Judges, with its characteristic apostasy, or even the division of Israel into two kingdoms, with its dire effects on the external union of the people, had all passed by before these accounts were actually written down. On the other hand, the highly developed prophetic conception of these events, and the skilful plan of the book demand that the author must have been a religious and ethical personality of the first rank. And as, finally, it is scarcely credible that Moses would have failed to provide for a systematic report of the great past of the people, for which account, before this and as long as only family histories were involved, there was no need felt, and as the subsequent books of the Pent, which are acknowledged in a literary way to be connected with Gen, in many of their parts expressly declare that Moses was their author (cf Exodus, IV), the Mosaic authorship of this book is as good as proved. This is not to deny that older sources and documents were used in the composition of the book, such as perhaps the genealogical tables or the events recorded in Gen 14, possibly, too, some referring to the history of the times before the Deluge and before Abraham. This is probable; but as all the parts of the book have been worked together into a literary unity (see under II and III above), and as such sources are not expressly mentioned, it is a hopeless task to try to describe these different sources in detail or even to separate them as independent documents, after the manner refuted under II and III above, as a theory and in its particulars. And for the age of Gen, we can refer to the fact that the personal pronoun here is still used for both genders, masculine and feminine, which is true also of the word na'ar ("youth"), a peculiarity which is shared also by the other books of the Pent almost throughout.

2. Examination of Counter-Arguments

(1) Possibility of later additions.—In itself it would be possible that from time to time some explanatory and interpreting additions could have been made to the original text, in case we find indications of a later period in some statements of the book. But that in this case these additions could not have been made by any unauthorized persons, but only officially, should, in the case of a book like Gen, be regarded as self-evident. But in our times this fact must be emphasized all the more, as in our days the most radical ideas obtain in reference to the way in which sacred books were used in former times. And then it must be said that we cannot prove as an absolute certainty that there is a single passage in Gen that originated in the post-Mosaic period.

(2) Rejection of the "prophecy-after-the-event" idea.—It is self-evident also that the fulfilment of a prophecy is not an evidence of a "prophecy after the event" (vaticinium post eventum), altogether independently of the fact that in this case Gen 12 1–3, which is still in process of fulfilment, could not have been written down even today (cf on this matter, perhaps, Noah's prophecy [9 25 ff]; or the prediction of the career of Esau [25 23; 27 40]; or of Ishmael [16 10 ff; 21 18]; or Jacob's blessing [Gen 49]). The last-mentioned case cannot in any way be interpreted as the product of a later time; cf the curse of Levi in vs 5–8 as compared with the honor bestowed on this tribe already in the Mosaic period (Ex 32 26–29; Dt 33 8–11), and in the time of the Judges (Jgs 17 7–13; 1 S 2 27 f). Zebulun, too, according to 49 13 is regarded as being settled on the coast, which is not in agreement with historical reality (cf Josh 19 10–16.27). In the same way the curse on Simeon in 49 5–7, which declared that his tribe should be distributed among Israel, was not fulfilled in the time when the people entered Canaan (cf Josh 19 1 and 2 Ch 34 6). In 49 10 "Shiloh" cannot refer to the coming of the tabernacle to Shiloh (cf Josh 18 1); for Shiloh is, on the other hand, to be interpreted personally and Messianically. As long as Shiloh was of any importance (cf 1 S 1 ff), Judah was not in the possession of the scepter; but when this scepter did come into the control of Judah, Shiloh had long since ceased to be of any significance (cf my book, Die messianische Erwartung der vorexilischen Propheten, 360 f).

(3) Special passages alleged to indicate a later date (Gen 12 6; 13 7; 22 2; 36 31 ff; 13 18; 23 2; 14 14).—In Gen 12 6; 13 7, it is claimed that it is presupposed that at the time of the author there were no longer any Canaanites in the country, so that these verses belong to a much later period than that of Moses. But on this supposition these verses would be altogether superfluous and therefore unintelligible additions. For that in the time of Abraham the Canaanites had not yet been expelled by Israel, was a self-evident matter for every Israelite. As a matter of fact, the statements in both verses can easily be interpreted. Abraham leaves his native country to go into a strange land. When he comes to Canaan, he finds it inhabited by the Canaanites (cf 10 6.15; 9 25 ff). This could have made his faith to fail him. God, accordingly, repeats His promise at this very moment and does so with greater exactness (cf ver 7 with ver 1), and Abraham shows that God can trust his faith (vs 7 f). The question whether the Canaanites no longer existed at the time the book was written, has nothing at all to do with the meaning of these verses. The same is true of 13 7, on account of the presence of the Canaanites and of the Perizzites, which latter tribe had probably come in the meanwhile and is not yet mentioned in Gen 10, but is mentioned in 15 20, and which makes the separation of Abraham and Lot only all the more necessary.

That in Gen 22 2 the land of Moriah is mentioned is claimed by the critics to be a proof that this passage was written after the times of David and even of Solomon, because according to 2 Ch 3 1 the temple stood on Mt. Moriah. But as in this latter passage one particular mountain is called Moriah, but in Abraham's time a whole country was so called, it is scarcely possible that Gen 22 2 could have been written at so late a period.

Usually, too, the list of 8 Edomite kings, who ruled before there was a king of Israel, according to 36 31 ff, is cited as a proof that this part was written only after the establishment of the kingdom in Israel, although the time down to the age of Saul would be entirely too long for only eight kings, as already in the Mosaic period there were kings in Edom (Nu 20 14). Then, too, we find in the days of Solomon a hereditary kingdom in Edom (1 K 11 14), while in Gen 36 31 ff we have to deal with an elective kingdom. Also it would be impossible to understand why this list of kings is carried down only so far and no farther, namely down to the time when there were kings in Israel. This statement can properly be interpreted only in the light of 17 6.16, where the promise is given to Abraham that kings should be found among his descendants (cf also 17 20 with 25 16); and in the light of ch 14, where Abraham is explicitly brought into connection with kings in a number of ways (with the four kings of the East, whom he conquers; with the five kings of the Jordan valley, whom he assists; with the King's Vale [ver 17], which prepared the way for the Melchizedek episode; and with this Priest-King himself, who blesses him and to whom he gives tithes [vs 18 ff]; with the king of Sodom, whom he rebukes [vs 21 ff]). Accordingly, the statement in 36 31 is not merely a dry historical notice, but is a reference to the blessing of God, which is realized in Israel at a much later time than in the kindred tribe of Esau, and which puts the faith of Israel to a new test. As the death of the last Edomite king is not mentioned (cf 36 39 in contrast to the preceding passage and to 1 Ch 1 50 f), but as detailed family data are given, we are doubtless dealing here with living contemporaries of Moses, in whose time already the Edomites possessed a kingdom (Nu 20 14; Jgs 11 17), just as this was the case with Amalek (Nu 24 7), with Moab (21 26; 22 4) and Midian (Nu 31 8). And why would a later writer have mentioned neither Selah (Petra), so important in later times (cf Isa 16 1; Jgs 1 36; 2 K 14 7), nor Ezion-Geber (1 K 9 26; 2 Ch 8 17 f), among the places given in Gen 36 40 ff? In Moses' time, however, the last-mentioned place was only prairie (Nu 33 35 f).

Just as little is it an argument against the Mosaic times that Hebron is mentioned in Gen 13 18; 23 2, which city, according to Josh 14 15; 15 13, is called Kiriath-arba, a name which Gen also is acquainted with (cf 23 2), and which in its signification of "city of Arba" points to an originally proper name. Hebron is the older name, which was resumed at a later period, after it had in the meanwhile been supplanted by the Canaanitic name, just as the name of Salem, which occurs already in the Am Tab, for a period of time gave way to the name of Jebus, but was afterward resumed. That Hebron was an old city and that it existed at a period earlier than the Arba mentioned in Josh 14 15; 15 13, and from whom its later name was derived, can be concluded from Nu 13 22.

Further, the mention of Dan in 14 14 does not necessarily favor the view that this chapter did not originate until after Josh 19 47. Jgs 18 29, where Leshem or Laish is changed into Dan (2 S 24 6; cf vs 2 and 15), does make the existence of another Dan probable. Since in Gen 14 2.3.7.17 so many ancient names are mentioned, and as the author is most fully informed as to the conditions of the political complexion of the old nations of that time (vs 5–7), it would be incomprehensible if he should not have made use of the ancient names Laish and Leshem. However, if this Dan was really meant, we should at most have to deal with a revision, such as that pointed out above. Some other less important arguments against the origin of Gen from the Mosaic times we can here ignore. The most important argument for the Mosaic origin of the book, in addition to those mentioned under 1, will now be discussed.

1. Foundation for the Whole of Revelation

VI. Significance.—In the history of the creation the most important feature for us is the fact that the world was created out of nothing (cf 1 1 and the word bārā'), which guarantees the absoluteness of God and His perfect control of the entire material world; further, the creation of man, as the crown of all creation, for which all things previously created prepare, and who is to rule over them, but who—most important of all—is created after the image of God (1 26 f), and whose body has been created by the hand of God and his soul breathed into him by God (2 7). On this fact, too, in the end, is founded the possibility of man's redemption even after the Fall (5 1.3; cf Col 3 9; Eph 4 24), as also the possibility of the incarnation of Jesus Christ, who also is the image of God (Col 1 15; 2 Cor 4 4). Then, too, another all-important factor for us is the unity of the human race, for thereby is made possible and can be understood the fact that all men have become subject to sin and all can be the recipients of grace (Rom 5 12 ff; 1 Cor 15 22 f.45 f). Also the need of redemption is brought out strongly in the Book of Gen. Cf, in connection with the Fall, the pains that shall attend the birth of a child, the cursing of the land, death (3 15 ff), which finds its first victim in Abel, and the monotonous and emphatic repetition of the formula, "and he died," in Gen 5, as characterizing the dismal fate of mankind, and which finds its expression in the rapid decrease of the length of life in the genealogies and in the ages of the patriarchs (5 1 ff; 11 10 ff; 25 7; 35 28; 47 28; 50 26; Ps 90 10), and in the irresistible and increasing power of death. By the side of this, sin at once assumes its most horrible form (Gen 3, doubt, pride, fear, boldness of Eve and Adam), and is propagated and increases; cf the murder and the despair of Cain (Gen 4 1 ff), which is still surpassed by the defiant blasphemy of Lamech (4 23 f); and in the same way, death, which is coming more and more rapidly (see above), is a proof for this, that sin is being more and more intimately interwoven with the human race. Cf, further, the corruption of the whole earth, which brings with it as a consequence the judgment of the Deluge (6 5 ff), after the period of grace extending over 120 years had fruitlessly passed by; the lack of reverence on the part of Ham (9 22); the arrogance in connection with the building of the tower of Babel (11 1 ff); the Sodomitic sin in 18 16—19 15; the daughters of Lot (19 30 ff). Still worse is it, that the elect also are not without blame. On Abraham, see IV, 1, 2*b;* then concerning Noah (9 21) and Lot's fearful drunkenness (19 32 ff); Isaac's and Rebekah's preference for Esau or Jacob (25 28); Jacob's deceptions of various kinds, his preference for Joseph (37 3); the horrible deeds of Simeon and Levi (34 25 ff; 49 5 ff); Reuben's incest (35 22; 49 3 f); the cruelty of the brethren of Joseph toward him and his father (ch 37); finally, Joseph's pride and his reporting his brethren (37 2.5 ff). In short, wherever we look, we see in Gen already a proof for the truth of Rom 3 23, "All have sinned, and fall short of the glory of God."

2. Preparation for Redemption

By the side of this need of salvation there is to be found also the longing for salvation; cf the name of Noah (5 29), and the word of blessing from the lips of Jacob (49 18); and, further, the fact that Abraham reaches out after the promised heir in Gen 15–18, and his desire for the possession of the land (12–14; 23; 28 20 ff; 33 19 f); and esp. from 47 27 on. And in harmony with this need and this longing for redemption we find above all other things the saving and the promising grace of God. He does not cause the bodily death to follow immediately upon the Fall in Gen 3 (although the beginning of the spiritual death sets in at once with the separation from God); He provides for mankind by Himself making garments for them out of skins (3 21); even the expulsion from Paradise is not merely a punishment; God fears that man might live forever if he should eat from the tree of life (3 22 ff). He sets enmity between the human race and the seed of the serpent, so that at least the possibility of a moral contest yet exists; He strengthens the good in Cain (4 7); He removes the pious Enoch (5 24); He saves Noah and his family and makes a covenant with him (8 21 ff); He gives His promise to Abraham (12 1–3) and makes a covenant with him (chs 15, 17); He delivers Lot (19 13 ff); He is willing even to preserve Sodom at Abraham's prayer, if there are as many as 10 just men in the city (18 32); He bestows a blessing on Ishmael also (16 10 ff; 17 20; 21 13 ff), and permits Isaac to bless Esau (27 39 ff); but above all He is with Isaac, Jacob and Joseph. It is indeed true that the thought runs through Gen that not all men are capable of receiving His grace, and that not all are drawn to the Father. Cain's sacrifice is not acceptable before God, as was Abel's; the Cainites with their advance in civilization (4 17 ff), to whom Lamech also belonged, are different from Seth (4 26; 5 1 ff), who continues the line of the elect. Finally, the godly, too, permit themselves to be deceived (6 1 ff), and Noah stands alone in his piety. After that Ham is cursed in his youngest son, Canaan (9 22; cf 10 6); but Shem is blessed to such a degree that his blessing is to extend to Japheth also; cf, further, the elimination from sacred history of Lot (19 29 ff); of Ishmael (25 12 ff), and of Esau (36 1 ff); of Sodom and Gomorrah (ch 19); then the choice of Jacob in preference to Esau (25 19—37 1); the preference of Ephraim over Manasseh (48 17 ff); the transmission of the Messianic promises to Judah (49 10; cf my book, Messianische Erwartung, 360 f), so that at the close of Gen we find already the hope of a personal Messiah expressed, in whom also the word (3 15) that was originally spoken to all mankind is to be entirely fulfilled, and in whom also the blessing given to Abraham shall find its significance and realization for the benefit of all mankind (12 3, and see above, I, 2 and 3). But in the history of Abraham this fact also becomes clear, that in the end this was all grace on the part of God, and faith on the part of man; and because both grace and faith are in Gen placed and emphasized at the very beginning of the history of mankind, and before the giving of the law (Ex 19 ff); then this grace and faith cannot be abrogated through the latter or made ineffective. Not by works but by faith is man saved (cf Gal 3 2; Rom 4; He 11 8 ff; Jas 2 21 ff). But the guidance of individuals and of His people by God, the ways which He took with His elect, become clear and intelligible ultimately in the history of Joseph; and all and everything must in the end serve the good of those who are His.

GENNAEUS, ge-nē′us, GENNEUS, ge-nē′us (Γενναῖος, Gennaíos): Father of Apollonius, one of the Syrian generals who troubled the Jews while Lysias was governor for Antiochus Eupator (2 Macc 12 2). The description is added to distinguish the Apollonius here mentioned from several others of the same name. See APOLLONIUS. There is no need with Luther to take the name simply as an adj. "des edlen Apollonius." The name occurs elsewhere as a proper name.

GENNESARET, ge-nes′a-ret, LAKE OF. See GALILEE, SEA OF.

1. The Name

GENNESARET, LAND OF, ge-nes′a-ret (ἡ γῆ Γεννησαρέτ, hē gḗ Gennēsarét): The first syllable of the name Gennesaret is evidently the Heb gan, "garden"; while the second may be a proper name. Possibly, however, the name may represent the Heb gannē sārīm, "princely gardens." It is applied to a district on the N.W. shore of the Sea of Galilee (Mt 14 34; Mk 6 53), now known as el-Ghuweir, "little Ghōr." It curves round from el-Mejdel in the S., to 'Ain et-Tīneh, or Khān Minyeh, in the N., a distance of over 3 miles, with an average breadth from the sea to the foot of the mountains of about a mile. The soil is deep, rich loam, of amazing fertility.

2. Water

In the S. it is watered by the stream from Wādy el-Ḥamām, the gorge that opens to the W. of el-Mejdel. The middle portion is supplied from 'Ain el-Madawwerah, a copious fountain near the western edge of the plain, round which a wall has been built, to raise the level of the water; and from the perennial stream, Wādy er-Rubadīyeh, which drives a mill before starting on its work of irrigation. Farther N., Wādy el-'Amūd brings down much water in the rainy season. The water from 'Ain et-Ṭābgha was brought round the promontory at 'Ain et-Tīneh by a conduit cut in the rock. It was used to drive certain mills, and also to refresh the neighboring land. This seems to be the fountain called "Capharnaum" by Jos (BJ, III, x, 8). This writer extols the productiveness of the plain. He says the "soil is so fruitful that all sorts of trees can grow upon it."

3. Fertility

The walnut, the palm, the olive and the fig, which usually require diverse conditions, flourish together here. "One may call this place the ambition of nature; . . . . it is a happy contention of the seasons, as if each of them claimed this country; for it not only nourishes different sorts of autumnal fruit beyond men's expectation, but preserves them a great while." He says that it supplies grapes and figs through ten months of the year, and other fruits as they ripen together throughout the year (ib). The fruits of Gennesaret had such high repute among the rabbis that they were not allowed in Jerus at the time of the feasts, lest any might be tempted to come merely for their enjoyment (Neubauer, Géog. du Talm, 45 f).

Centuries of neglect made a sad change in the plain. It was largely overgrown with thorn-bushes, and it yielded one of the finest crops of thistles in the country. Cultivation was confined to the S.W. part; and the rest furnished grazing ground for a tribe of nomads. Recently the German Catholics made extensive purchases, including the village of el-Mejdel. Considerable portions have also passed into the hands of Jews. The land is almost entirely cleared, and it rewards the toil of the husbandman with all its ancient generosity. W. Ewing

GENTILES, jen′tīlz (גּוֹי, gōy, pl. גּוֹיִם, gōyim; ἔθνος, éthnos, "people," "nation"): Goy (or Goi) is rendered "Gentiles" in AV in some 30 passages, but much more frequently "heathen," and oftener still, "nation," which latter is the usual rendering in RV, but it is commonly used for a non-Israelitish people, and thus corresponds to the meaning of "Gentiles." It occurs, however, in passages referring to the Israelites, as in Gen 12 2; Dt 32 28; Josh 3 17; 4 1; 10 13; 2 S 7 23; Isa 1 4; Zeph 2 9, but the word 'ām (עָם) is the term commonly used for the people of God. In the NT ethnos is the word corresponding to gōy in the OT and is rendered "Gentiles" by both VSS, while laós (λαός) is the word which corresponds to 'ām. AV also renders Ἕλληνες, Héllēnes, "Gentiles" in six passages (Jn 7 35; Rom 2 9.10; 3 9; 1 Cor 10 32; 12 13), but RV renders "Greeks."

The Gentiles were far less sharply differentiated from the Israelites in OT than in NT times. Under OT regulations they were simply non-Israelites, not from the stock of Abraham, but they were not hated or despised for that reason, and were to be treated almost on a plane of equality, except certain tribes in Canaan with regard to whom there were special regulations of non-intercourse. The gentile stranger enjoyed the hospitality of the Israelite who was commanded to love him (Dt 10 19), to sympathize with him, "For ye know the heart of the stranger, seeing ye were strangers in the land of Egypt" (Ex 23 9 AV). The Kenites were treated almost as brethren, esp. the children of Rechab (Jgs 1 16; 5 24; Jer 35). Uriah the Hittite was a trusted warrior of David (2 S 11); Ittai the Gittite was captain of David's guard (18 2); Araunah the Jebusite was a respected resident of Jerus. The Gentiles had the right of asylum in the cities of refuge, the same as the Israelites (Nu 35 15). They might even possess Israelitish slaves (Lev 25 47), and a gentile servant must not be defrauded of his wage (Dt 24 15). They could inherit in Israel even as late as the exile (Ezk 47 22.23). They were allowed to offer sacrifices in the temple at Jerus, as is distinctly affirmed by Jos (BJ, II, xvii, 2–4; Ant, XI, viii, 5; XIII, viii, 2; XVI, ii, 1; XVIII, v, 3; CAp, II, 5), and it is implied in the Levitical law (Lev 22 25). Prayers and sacrifices were to be offered for gentile rulers (Jer 29 7; Bar 1 10.11; Ezr 6 10; 1 Macc 7 33; Jos, BJ, II, x, 4). Gifts might be received from them (2 Macc 5 16; Jos, Ant, XIII, iii, 4; XVI, vi, 4; BJ, V, xiii, 6; CAp, II, 5). But as we approach the Christian era the attitude of the Jews toward the Gentiles changes, until we find, in NT times, the most extreme aversion, scorn and hatred. They were regarded as unclean, with whom it was unlawful to have any friendly intercourse. They were the enemies of God and His people, to whom the knowledge of God was denied unless they became proselytes, and even then they could not, as in ancient times, be admitted to full fellowship. Jews were forbidden to counsel them, and if they asked about Divine things they were to be cursed. All children born of mixed marriages were bastards. That is what caused the Jews to be so hated by Greeks and Romans, as we have abundant evidence in the writings of Cicero, Seneca and Tacitus. Something of this is reflected in the NT (Jn 18 28; Acts 10 28; 11 3).

If we inquire what the reason of this change was we shall find it in the conditions of the exiled Jews, who suffered the bitterest treatment at the hands of their gentile captors and who, after their return and establishment in Judaea, were in constant conflict with neighboring tribes and esp. with the Gr rulers of Syria. The fierce persecution of Antiochus IV, who attempted to blot out their religion and Hellenize the Jews, and the desperate struggle for independence, created in them a burning patriotism and zeal for their faith which culminated in the rigid exclusiveness we see in later times. GENTLENESS, jen′t'l-nes (עֲנָה, 'ānāh; ἐπιείκεια, epieíkeia, χρηστότης, chrēstótēs): In 2 S 22 36 'ānāh, "to bend low," "to condescend," is tr^{d} "gentleness," "Thy gentleness hath made me great," RVm "or condescension"; so also Ps 18 35, where the word is 'anwāh, "humility," "gentleness," or "condescension." In the NT epieikeia ("fairness," "moderation," in Acts 24 4 tr^{d} "clemency") is in 2 Cor 10 1 tr^{d} "gentleness," "the meekness and gentleness of Christ" (2 Macc 2 22 "favour," RV "forbearance"); chrēstotēs, "kindness," "usefulness," is tr^{d} "gentleness" in Gal 5 22 AV, RV "kindness"; chrēstós is the word tr^{d} "kind" (to the unthankful and evil, Lk 6 35), and chrēstotēs seems to carry in it a similar idea of active kindness.

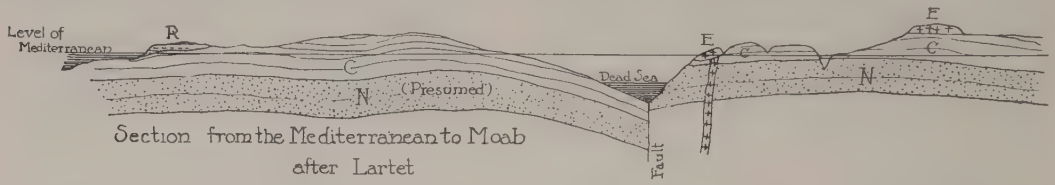
Gentle occurs in the OT only in RV of Jer 11 19, "I was like a gentle lamb" (kebhes). In the NT it is the tr of ḗpios, "mild," "gentle" (1 Thess 2 7; 2 Tim 2 24), and of epieikḗs, "fitting," "proper," etc (1 Tim 3 3 RV; Tit 3 2; Jas 3 17; 1 Pet 2 18); also, with art., Phil 4 5 (AV "moderation," RV "forbearance"). In 2 Macc 15 12 Onias is said (AV) to be "gentle [práos] in condition," RV "in manner." W. L. Walker

GENUBATH, gḗ-nū′bath (גְּנֻבַת, g^{e}nubhath, "theft"): Son of Hadad, the fugitive Edomite prince, born and brought up at the court of Egypt, whither Hadad had fled when David conquered Edom (1 K 11 20). His mother was a sister of Tahpenes, queen of the Pharaoh who ruled Egypt at that time, and who belonged to the notoriously weak and uninfluential 21st dynasty.

GEOGRAPHY, jē-og′ra-fi. See Palestine; Table of Nations; World.

GEOLOGY, je-ol′o-ji, OF PALESTINE: The geology of Pal cannot be discussed intelligently without taking into consideration the surrounding regions. The accompanying map shows, with considerable freedom, the distribution of the superficial strata of Syria, Pal and Sinai, with parts of Asia Minor, Arabia and Egypt. (Data for this map were obtained from the "Geological Map of Egypt" [1:1,000,000] and from the "Carte géologique internationale de l'Europe" [1:1,500,000].) It will be noted that Crystalline, or Archaean, rocks (A) occupy extensive areas in Asia Minor, and that they are found in the S. in Sinai, Western Arabia, and Eastern and Southern Egypt. Relatively small areas of Paleozoic rocks (P) adjoin the Crystalline rocks in Sinai and Arabia and E. of Caesarea in Asia Minor. A notable area of Paleozoic occurs S.E. of the Dead Sea. This is also adjacent to Crystalline rocks, which could not be indicated on the map on account of their slight superficial extent. Bordering either the Crystalline or the Paleozoic rocks in Egypt, Sinai and Arabia are large areas of Nubian Sandstone (N). The Nubian Sandstone in turn is generally bounded by Upper Cretaceous limestone (C), and the last by Tertiary deposits (T). The Quaternary, or Recent, deposits (R) and also the Eruptive rocks (E) sustain no constant relations to any particular ones of the other formations. The Quaternary follows the great rivers and the seacoasts. The Eruptive rocks usually overlie the others. They occupy extensive areas in Asia Minor, Syria and Arabia.

If we concentrate our attention upon the Crystalline, Cretaceous, and Tertiary, which are the most extensive formations, we find that the Crystalline rocks are abundant in the S. and in the N., that the Cretaceous are most widely spread in Pal and Southern Syria, and the Tertiary in Northern Syria and Egypt. We may believe that the Crystalline areas of the N. and S. have been land since the end of the Archaean age, and that what are now Syria, Pal and most of Egypt remained sea for a long time afterward. The Paleozoic areas were lifted above the sea and added to the northern and southern land areas during or at the end of the Paleozoic era. The regions in which we find Nubian Sandstone or Upper Cretaceous limestone became land by the end of the Mesozoic era. Finally the Tertiary areas were lifted out of the sea. During the Quaternary period the Nile and the rivers of Mesopotamia have added large areas to the land surface.



Section from the Mediterranean to Moab after Lartet

1. Crystalline Rocks (A)

The Crystalline rocks consist mainly of granite and crystalline schists, frequently interrupted with dykes of porphyry, diorite and other eruptives. It will be seen by the map that the Crystalline rocks are nowhere adjacent to the Mediterranean, but that they touch the Nile at Aṣwân, where the river in pouring over these rocks makes the First Cataract, or rather did before the construction of the great dam. Granite quarried at Aṣwân could be loaded on boats and conveyed to any city on the shores of the Mediterranean, and it is the granite of Aṣwân of which are composed not only many of the monuments of Egypt, but also the pillars which adorned many temples in Syria and Pal.

2. Paleozoic Rocks (P)

The Paleozoic rocks of Sinai and Arabia are of Carboniferous age, but do not include any beds of coal. Those E. of Caesarea are Devonian. Those S.E. of the Dead Sea are the oldest of all, being of Cambrian age.

3. Triassic and Jurassic Rocks (J)

Several formations which are well developed in the British Islands, are not found in Pal, but a small Triassic area is found near the Gulf of Alexandretta, while Jurassic strata are found in the region of Hermon and in Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon. The small scale of the accompanying map makes it impossible to represent accurately the extent of these rocks.

4. Nubian Sandstone (N)

This name was given by Russegger, who in the middle of the 19th cent. followed and studied this formation from the Sûdân to Syria. Wherever the Nubian Sandstone is found in contact with the Upper Cretaceous limestone it underlies the latter conformably. In Lebanon, Anti-Lebanon and Hermon (but not farther S.) it is conformably underlaid by Jurassic limestone. It follows, therefore, that its upper strata (the only ones found in the N.) must be of Lower or Middle Cretaceous age. In the S., however, the Jurassic limestone is entirely absent. In Western Sinai the Nubian Sandstone rests conformably on Carboniferous limestone, and by the Dead Sea on Cambrian limestone, while at Petra and at many other places it rests unconformably on Crystalline rocks. While the consideration of the age of the Nubian Sandstone presents no difficulty in Lebanon, Anti-Lebanon and Hermon, it is a very different matter in Western Sinai, and by the Dead Sea. Sandstone is generally supposed to be formed more rapidly than most other rocks. It is, therefore, rather staggering to try to conceive of even the 2,000 ft. of sandstone at the S.E. end of the Dead Sea as having been in process of formation from the Cambrian to the Cretaceous. The Nubian Sandstone is commonly brown or reddish, but in places shows great variety of color. The temples and tombs of Petra were all carved in this rock. It is in places very friable, and in others compact and hard. The sands of the Arabian deserts have been in the main derived from it, being carried by the prevailing west winds. Where it is covered by a sheet of eruptive rock (ḥarrah), it is protected from erosion, with the result that the land to the E. is not converted into a sandy desert (Hogarth, Penetration of Arabia). It frequently includes strata of clay and shale and thin seams of coal or lignite, and must have been deposited in seas which were at the time relatively shallow.

5. Upper Cretaceous Limestone (C)

This is the principal rock of Pal, Lebanon, and Anti-Lebanon. Many of its strata are very fossiliferous, and no doubt exists as to its age. It furnishes the best of building stone and is a source of lime. The soils formed from it are fertile, and the mountain sides have been terraced by the patient labor of centuries.

6. Tertiary Rocks (T)

A notable Tertiary fossil is the Nummulite, which occurs in abundance in the rock of the pyramids of Gîzeh and in other places. Relatively small masses of Tertiary strata (not shown on the map) are found on the coast at the mouths of the principal streams of Lebanon, showing that while the mass of Lebanon had risen from the sea by the beginning of the Tertiary, the elevation was not complete. The principal river courses had, however, already been formed, and the streams were already carrying into the sea the scourings of the rocks of early Lebanon, which were being laid down to form these Tertiary strata.

These consist mainly of the superficial deposits of the Nile, the Euphrates and other large streams. At various points along the coast of Syria and Pal are extensive sand dunes. Frequently under the loose sand, or exposed, is found a sandstone which instead of being entirely siliceous, like most sandstones, is partly calcareous, containing from 15 to 25 per cent of calcium-carbonate. This is probably an aeolian formation, i.e. consolidated under the influence of the atmosphere, and not formed under the sea, like most stratified rocks. It is easily worked and is much used for building.

8. Palestine

It may be gathered from the foregoing statements that the rocks of Pal are mainly Cretaceous. The Jurassic limestone, which in Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon underlies the Nubian Sandstone, is absent in Pal, but, at least in Eastern Pal, as in Lebanon, we find the Upper Cretaceous limestone to be underlaid by the Nubian Sandstone. A striking feature of the geology of Pal is the Jordan valley fault. At some time, probably at the beginning of the Tertiary period, when Lebanon, Anti-Lebanon, and the Judaean hills were being lifted out of the sea, the earth's crust was rent for at least several hundred miles along a line nearly N. and S., or more exactly from a little W. of S. to a little E. of N. This line runs through the Gulf of 'Aḳabah, the Wâdi-'Arabah, the Dead Sea, the Jordan valley, the Sea of Tiberias, the Ḥûleh, and the valley between Hermon and Anti-Lebanon on the one hand and Lebanon on the other. The resulting disturbance of the strata is most evident in the region of the Dead Sea. There is no evidence that the two walls of the fissure separated from one another, but the E. wall slipped up and the W. wall down for perhaps 2,000 ft, so that on the E. shore of the Dead Sea and in the valleys entering the Jordan, Dead Sea, and 'Arabah from the E., the Nubian Sandstone is exposed, underlying the Upper Cretaceous limestone, while on the W. side, even down to the level of the Dead Sea, 1,290 ft. below the Mediterranean, the Nubian Sandstone is nowhere visible, although it may be presumed to exist there also below the upper limestone. (See the acccompanying ideal section, after Lartet, through Judaea, the Dead Sea and Moab.) The great fault and the subsidiary faults which accompany it occasioned the outpourings of igneous rock which are abundant along the line of the fault. The numerous hot springs (e.g. Tiberias, Wâdi-Yarmûk, Wâdi-Zarḳa-Mâ'în [Callirrhoe], Wâdi-ul-Ḥisa) may be due to subterranean streams of water coming in contact with deeply buried and still heated masses of igneous rock.

GEON, gē'on. See Gihon (Apoc).

GEPHYRUN, ge-fī'run (Γεφυρούν, Gephuroún): In 2 Macc 12 13, referring to the capture by Judas of a stronghold E. of Jordan, RV reads, "And he also fell upon a certain city Gephyrun, ... it was named Caspin." There appears to be some confusion in the text. There is nothing to indicate the relation between the two names. AV renders, "He went also about to make a bridge." The name of the city in Jos (Ant, XII, viii, 5) is Ephron (q.v.).

GERA, gē'ra (גֵּרָא, gērā', "grain"): A family name of the tribe of Benjamin, hence not necessarily a separate individual in (3) and (4) below:

(1) A son of Benjamin (Gen 46 21).

(2) According to 1 Ch 8 3.5.7, son of Bela and grandson of Benjamin. The name is repeated (ver 5) in the list of Bela's sons.

(3) Father, or ancestor, of the judge Ehud (Jgs 3 15).

(4) Father, or ancestor, of Shimei, the Benjamite, who cursed David when he fled from Absalom (2 S 16 5; 19 16.18; 1 K 2 8).

GERAH, gē'ra (גֵּרָה, gērāh, "grain" or "kernel"): A weight, the 20th part of a shekel (Ex 30 13; Lev 27 25; Nu 3 47; 18 16; Ezk 45 12). See Weights and Measures.

GERAR, gē'rär (גְּרָר, g^erār, "circle," "region"; Γεραρά, Gerará): A town in the Phili plain S. of Gaza (Gen 10 19), where both Abraham and Isaac sojourned for a time, and where they came into contact with Abimelech, king of G. (Gen 20 and 26, passim). The place has not been fully identified, but the site is probably in one of the branches of Wady Sheri'a, at a place called Um Jerrâr, near the coast S.W. of Gaza and 9 miles from it (SWP, III, 389–90). The site answers fairly well to the statements of Eusebius and Jerome, Onom, that it was 25 (Rom) miles S. of Eleutheropolis (Beit Jibrîn). It is actually 30 Eng. miles, but distances were not very accurately determined in early times. G. was known in the first 5 cents. AD, when it was the seat of a bishopric, and its bishop, Marcian, attended the Council of Chalcedon 451 AD. It was also the seat of a monastery.

The statements in Gen indicate that G. belonged to the Philis, and we are led to infer that Abimelech was king of that people, but it is quite certain that they did not occupy this region until after the time of Abraham, in fact only a short time before the Exodus. It is probable, however, that the writer of Gen would refer to the country as it was known in his day. The town certainly existed in the Phili period, for it is mentioned in connection with Asa, who defeated the Ethiopian host under Zerar and pursued them in their flight unto G. (2 Ch 14 13). Sir William Flinders Petrie, in his work at Gerar, 1928, found the Philistine furnaces for smelting iron. The incoming of Israel as shown at Kiriath-sepher was at the beginning of the Iron Age. These furnaces explain the sudden introduction of iron. Kiriath-sepher has a great layer of ashes, below which everything is Canaanite, Bronze Age; above which everything is Israelite, Iron Age. An actual Conquest by Israel is shown and a cultural date clearly indicated. The best opinion of experts puts this 1275 BC. See Kiriath-sepher.

GERASA, ger'a-sa, GERASENES, ger'a-sēnz (Γέρασα, Gérasa; Γερασηνῶν, Gerasēnôn):

1. Country of the Gerasenes

(1) The town itself is not named in Scripture, and is referred to only in the expression, "country of the Gerasenes" (Mk 5 1; Lk 8 26.37; see WH, App., 11). This describes the district in which Christ met and healed the demoniac from the tombs, where also took place the destruction of the swine. It was on the eastern shore of the Sea of Galilee, and must have been a locality where the steep edges of the Bashan plateau drop close upon the brink of the lake. This condition is fulfilled only by the district immediately S. of Wādy Semak, N. of Ḳal'at el-Ḥuṣn. Here the slopes descend swiftly almost into the sea, and animals, once started on the downward run, could not avoid plunging into the depths. Many ancient tombs are to be seen in the face of the hills. Gerasa itself is probably represented by the ruins of Kurseh on the S. side of Wādy Semak, just where it opens on the seashore. The ruins of the town are not considerable; but there are remains of a strong wall which must have surrounded the place. Traces of ancient buildings in the vicinity show that there must have been a fairly numerous population in the district.

(2) The great and splendid city in the Decapolis is first mentioned as taken after a siege by Alexander Jannaeus, 85 BC (BJ, I, iv, 8). Jos names it as marking the eastern limit of Peraea (BJ, III, iii, 3). He calls the inhabitants Syrians, when, at the beginning of the Jewish revolt, the district round Gerasa was laid waste. The Syrians made reprisals, and took many prisoners. With these, however, the Gerasenes dealt mercifully, letting such as wished go free, and escorting them to the border (BJ, II, xviii, 1, 5). Lucius Annius, at the instance of Vespasian, sacked and burned the city, with much slaughter (BJ, IV, ix, 1). From this disaster it appears soon to have recovered, and the period of its greatest prosperity lay, probably, in the 2d and 3d cents. of our era. It became the seat of a bishopric, and one of its bishops attended the Council of Chalcedon. Reland (Pal, II, 806) notes certain extant coins of Gerasa, from which it is clear that in the 2d cent. it was a center of the worship of Artemis. It was besieged by Baldwin II, in 1121 AD. Mention is made of the strength of the site and the mighty masonry of its walls. William of Tyre calls the city Jarras, and places it 16 miles E. of Jordan (Hist, xii, 16). The distance is about 19 miles from the river. It was conquered by the Moslems in the time of Omar (Guy le Strange, Pal under the Moslems, 462). The sultan of Damascus is said to have fortified it; but there is nothing to show that the Moslems occupied it for any length of time.

2. History

3. Description

Modern Jerash lies on both banks of Wādy Jerash, about 6 miles from its confluence with Wādy ez-Zerḳā (the Jabbok). It is almost 20 miles from ʽAmmān (Philadelphia), and 22 from Fāhil (Pella). The ruins are wide and imposing and are better preserved than any others on the E. of Jordan. They include several splendid temples, theaters, basilica, palaces and baths, with hippodrome and naumachia. The triumphal arch to the S. of the city is almost entire. Two paved streets with double colonnades cut through the city at right angles, four massive pedestals still marking the point of intersection. An excellent account of the ruins is given in Thomson's LB, III, 558 ff.

There is nothing above ground of older date than the 2d and 3d cents. of our era; but there is no reason to doubt that the Gr city of Gerasa stood on the same site. The presence of a copious spring of sweet water makes it probable that the site has been occupied from olden time; but no trace remains of any ancient city. Some would identify the place with Ramoth-gilead, which see.

The site is now occupied by a colony of Circassians, and there is reason to fear that, unless something is done to preserve them, many valuable remains of antiquity will perish.

GERGESENES, gûr′ge-sēnz, gûr-ge-sēnz′: A false reading of "Gadarenes" retained in AV of Mt 8 28. See Gadara.

1. Scriptural References

GERIZIM, ger′i-zim, gė̆-rī′zim, MOUNT (הַר גְּרִזִּים, har gerizzīm): Named in the directions for the reading of the law (Dt 11 29), and in the account of that great ceremony (Dt 27 12; Josh 8 33 f). Mts. Ebal and Gerizim stood over against each other, and on their sides the peoples were placed, half upon one and half upon the other, while in the vale which separates the mountains stood the ark, with the Levites. Those who stood on Gerizim responded to the blessings, those on Mt. Ebal to the cursings, as these were spoken "with a loud voice" by the Levites. From a spur of Mt. Gerizim Jotham spoke his taunting parable to the men of Shechem (Jgs 9 7). Such acoustics at this point are now well attested. In consequence of the dispute which arose over the marriage of Manasseh, who belonged to the high-priestly family, with a daughter of Sanballat the Horonite (Neh 13 28), a temple was built on Gerizim as a rival to that in Jerus (c 432 BC). This was the beginning of the schism which lasts to the present day (Ant, XI, viii, 2, 4). See Samaritans. The temple was destroyed by John Hyrcanus c 110 BC (Ant, XIII, ix, 1; BJ, I, ii, 6).

2. Description

Mt. Gerizim, the modern Jebel eṭ-Ṭûr, stands on the S., Mt. Ebal on the N., of the narrow pass which cuts through the mountain range, opening a way from the sea to the Jordan. In the throat of this pass to the W., on the S. of the vale, and close to the foot of Gerizim, lies the town of Nablûs, the ancient Shechem. Here copious fountains rise, filling the valley with beauty and fruitfulness. The sides of the mountain are steep and rocky on E. and N.; on the W. the ascent is more gradual, and here, by means of a system of terraces carried almost to the summit, it is cultivated with great care and success. Its height is 2,849 ft. above the level of the sea, 228 ft. lower than its northern companion.

3. Samaritan Traditions

Abraham came through the pass and camped near Gerizim at the oak of Moreh (Gen 12 6). According to Sam tradition it was on this mountain that he prepared to sacrifice Isaac, and at Salem, not far distant, he met Melchizedek (Gen 14 17 ff). The scene of Jacob's dream is placed at Khirbet Lauzeh on the summit (Gen 28 11 f). In a little hollow W. of the ridge, the Samaritans annually celebrate the Passover in accordance with the directions of the Pent. This is done in the open air, their temple having long since disappeared.

4. Antiquities

The most important remains on the mountain today are those of Justinian's fortress, built in 533 AD, to protect the church which had been erected in 475 AD. Near the center of the plateau is a bare piece of rock, on which, tradition says, the altar stood in the Sam temple. A cup-like hollow in it may have been used for libations. In the western wall of el-Ḳalʽah, Justinian's castle, there are 12 stones under which, it is said, are the stones which Israel took from the bed of the Jordan (Josh 4 20).

Mount Gerizim with Shechem.

Gerizim was certainly "this mountain" pointed to by the woman of Samaria in her conversation with Jesus (Jn 4 20 f); the cliffs of the mountain almost overhanging the Well of Jacob.

For the reason why Gerizim was chosen for the blessing and Ebal for the cursing we are left to conjecture. The directions were fixed by one looking to the E., not, as with us, looking to the N. For one standing in the valley, therefore, Gerizim was on the right hand, "the side of good fortune" (Driver, Deuteronomy on 11 28).

Onom places Ebal and Gerizim much nearer the Jordan valley. This was doubtless to meet the difficulty raised by the long distance from Ai to Shechem. But their nearness to the "oaks of Moreh" (Dt 11 30) points to this locality, and this is confirmed by Jos, who speaks of Shechem, the metropolis of the Samaritans, as "a city situated at Mt. Gerizim" (Ant, XI, viii, 6).

Andronicus, appointed governor of Gerizim by Antiochus Epiphanes, is mentioned in 2 Macc 5 23 (AV "Garizim").

GERON, gē'run (Γέρων, Gérōn): Not much seems to be gained by translating with RVm "Geron, an Athenian," for "an old man of Athens" in 2 Macc 6 1.

GERRENIANS, ge-rē'ni-anz (ἕως τῶν Γερρηνῶν, héōs tṓn Gerrēnṓn): The name indicates the southern limit of the territory assigned by Antiochus Eupator to the government of Judas Maccabaeus when he "left Hegemonides governor from Ptolemaïs even unto the Gerrenians" (2 Macc 13 24, AV "Gerrhenians"). It is not easy to say exactly who the G. were. They were wrongly associated by Grotius with the town Gerrha, and are with more probability connected with the ancient city of Gerar, S.E. of Gaza. One MS reads Gerarēnōn, which could easily be corrupted into Gerrēnōn, and would place the government of Hegemonides between Ptolemaïs and Gerar.

GERSHOM, gûr'shom (גֵּרְשֹׁם, gērᵉshōm, from gārash, "to cast out"; explained, however, in Ex 2 22 and 18 3 as from gūr, "For he said, I have been a sojourner in a foreign land"):

(1) Firstborn son of Moses and Zipporah. The only details of his life contained in the Pent are the account of his circumcision (Ex 4 25), and his remaining under the care of Jethro, while Moses was in Egypt leading the Exodus. His descendants were numbered among the tribes of Levi (1 Ch 23 14). One of them apparently was the Jonathan who officiated as priest of the idolatrous sanctuary at Dan, and whose descendants held the office until the captivity. The MT inserts a suspended נ, n, in the name of Moses (משה), causing it to be read מנשה, Manasseh, for the purpose, according to tradition, of disguising the name out of respect for the revered Lawgiver. Another descendant described as a "son" was Shebuel, a ruler over the treasuries of David.

(2) A son of Levi, so called in 1 Ch 6 16.17.20.43.62.71 (Heb 1.2.5.28.47.56); 15 7; elsewhere Gershon (q.v.).

(3) A descendant of Phinehas, the head of a father's house, who journeyed with Ezra from Babylon to Jerus in the reign of Artaxerxes (Ezr 8 2).

GERSHON, gûr'shon, GERSHONITES, gûr'shon-īts (גֵּרְשׁוֹן, gērᵉshōn, written also gērᵉshōm): Firstborn of the 3 sons of Levi (Ex 6 16; Nu 3 17; 1 Ch 6 1.16 m; 23 6). He had two sons, Libni, also known as Ladan (1 Ch 23 7; 26 21), and Shimei (Ex 6 17; Nu 3 18; 1 Ch 6 17.20), and consequently two groups of descendants, enumerated in the census taken in the Wilderness of Sinai (Nu 3 21 ff) and that in the Plains of Moab (Nu 26 57). In the distribution of functions among the Levites, the Gershonites were charged with the carrying of the curtains, coverings, screens, hangings, cords and instruments of the tabernacle and the tent of meeting on the journeys in the wilderness, under the supervision of Ithamar the son of Aaron. Their function was thus more exalted than that of the Merarites, who carried the boards, and less so than that of the Kohathites, who carried the most holy utensils and symbols. The Gershonites were given two wagons with four oxen—half as many as the Merarites, according to their service (Nu 7 7). Thirteen cities were assigned to the Gershonites in Northern Pal by Eleazar and Joshua (Josh 21 6. 27–33 ‖ 1 Ch 6 62.71–76).

Among the Gershonites who achieved distinction in later Bib. times was the family of Asaph, the singers from the time of David to the days of the Second Temple (1 Ch 6 31–47; 25 1–7; 15 7.17. 19; 16 5.7; 2 Ch 35 15; Ezr 2 41; 3 10; Neh 11 17.22; 12 35; 1 Ch 9 15). Other Gershonites named are the heads of the fathers' houses in the days of David in connection with the dividing of the Levites into courses (1 Ch 23 7–11); the superintendents of the treasuries of the house of the Lord of the same time (1 Ch 26 21.22; 29 8); and, finally, Gershonites are mentioned among those who cleansed the house of the Lord in the days of Hezekiah (2 Ch 29 12.13).

GERSON, gûr'sun (Γηρσών, Gērsṓn; 1 Esd 8 29): Called Gershom in Ezr 8 2.

GERUTH CHIMHAM, gē'rōōth kim'ham (גֵּרוּת כִּמְהָם, gērūth kimhām): If the reading gērūth is correct, a "lodging-place" or "khan" on the highway to Egypt, may be meant (Jer 41 17). It may have been built by Chimham son of Barzillai; or it may have been named from him as owner of the land on which it stood. But probably with Jos we should read gidhrōth, "hurdles" or "sheep pens" (Ant, X, ix, 5).

GERZITES, gûr'zīts (1 S 27 8 AVm). See Girzites.

GESHAN, gē'shan (גֵּישָׁן, gēshān, "firm," "strong"): A descendant of Judah through Caleb (1 Ch 2 47). AV has "Gesham," but not in the original 1611 edition.

GESHEM, gē'shem (גֶּשֶׁם, geshem, גַּשְׁמוּ, gashmū; Γῆσαμ, Gḗsam, "rain storm"): An Arabian, probably chief of an Arabian tribe that had either settled in Southern Pal during the exile in Babylon, or had been settled in or near Samaria by Sargon (Neh 2 19; 6 1.2.6). He was a confederate of Sanballat and Tobiah, and strenuously opposed the building of the wall under Nehemiah. He with the others mocked at the first efforts to build the wall, and afterward repeatedly sought to entice Nehemiah to the plains of Ono. The name also occurs in the form Gashmū, perhaps an Assyr form of the same name Geshem.

J. J. Reeve

GESHUR, gē'shur (גְּשׁוּר, gᵉshūr, "bridge"): An Aramaean kingdom (2 S 15 8) of no great size which lay probably to the S. of Maacah, and formed with it the western boundary of the land of Bashan (Dt 3 14; Josh 12 5; 13 11). The territory of these two probably corresponded roughly with modern Jaulān. It may not have reached quite to the Jordan on the W.; in which case the Geshurites lit. dwelt "in the midst" of Israel (Josh 13 13), since they were not expatriated by the half-tribe of Manasseh, and they retained their independence. David married Maacah, daughter of Talmai, king of Geshur, who became the mother of Absalom and Tamar (2 S 3 3). To Talmai Absalom fled for safety after the murder of Amnon (13 37 f), and thence Joab brought him back to Jerus (14 23). The Geshurites and Aram are said to have taken the cities of Jair—i.e. Havvoth-jair—which lay in the land of Gilead (1 Ch 2 23). It is possible that "Geshurites" should be read, with Vulg, Syr, etc, instead of "Ashurites" in 2 S 2 9. The only difficulty is that Geshur was an independent kingdom, and there is nothing to show how it was brought under the sway of the son of Saul. In the catalogue of land still to be possessed in Josh 13 2, AV reads "Geshuri," RV "the Geshurites," referring evidently to a district bordering on the Philis. Both AV and RV render the same word by "Geshurites" in 1 S 27 8, where apparently the same territory is indicated as invaded by David. In neither passage is the text above suspicion; in 1 S 27 8 LXX B omits the name. No satisfactory explanation has been suggested. W. EWING

GESHURITES, gesh′ū̇-rīts, gḗ-shōō′rīts (גְּשׁוּרִי, gᵉshūrī). See preceding article.

GESTURE, jes′ṭur, jes′ṭū̇r: The Oriental is rich in gestures by which feelings are expressed and force added to words. Of this we have abundant illustration in the Bible. Almost every available part of the body was employed in gesture. In salutations the whole body was bowed, sometimes to the ground (Gen 18 2; 19 1; 33 7; 42 6; 33 3, 7 t), falling on the face to the ground and bowing to the ground, 3 t (1 S 20 41; cf Gen 23 7; 2 S 9 8; 18 21; 1 K 2 19); it was common also to embrace and kiss (Ex 18 7), etc, weeping for joy. Esau "fell on [Jacob's] neck, and kissed him: and they wept" (Gen 33 4); cf Joseph and his brethren (45 14.15); David and Jonathan (1 S 20 41), and the father of the prodigal (Lk 15 20). We have the kiss also in the story of Judas with his Master (Mt 26 49). Bowing the knee was also in Egypt an act of homage to a superior (Gen 41 43); bowing the knee and bowing down were common in prayer and worship (1 K 19 18; 2 Ch 6 13; Ezr 9 5; Isa 45 23); in prayer the head and whole body were also bowed (Gen 24 26; 2 K 5 18; 2 Ch 29 28 f). The rabbins decreed that in prayer "in bowing down, the back must be bent so low that every vertebra becomes conspicuous," and endless questions arose as to what it was lawful to do during prayer (Edersheim). We read also of prayer offered standing (1 S 1 26; 1 K 8 22; Mt 6 5; Mk 11 25), lifting up and spreading forth the hands (1 K 8 22; 2 Ch 6 13; Ezr 9 5; Neh 8 6; 1 Tim 2 8); "lifting up the hands" was synonymous with prayer (Ps 77 2; 141 2; Lam 2 19; 1 Tim 2 8); falling on the knees in pleading (1 K 1 13). Reverence for the aged was expressed by rising up in their presence (Lev 19 32, "Thou shalt rise up before the hoary head"; cf Lam 5 12). The hand was also laid on the mouth in token of respect (Job 29 9); in token of blessing the right hand was placed on the head (Gen 48 14; cf 49 26; Prov 10 6). The hands were laid on the head of the animal to be sacrificed; on the scapegoat and sin offering as denoting the transference of sin; on the burnt offering, perhaps as representing the offerer (Lev 1 4; 16 21). The hands were lifted up in blessing (Lev 9 22), in solemn swearing (Gen 14 22; Ex 6 8 m; Dt 32 40), in defiance and threatening (2 S 20 21); extended in pleading (Isa 65 2). Giving the hand or joining hands as a pledge of friendship and fidelity (2 K 10 15; Prov 11 21) was the origin of the widespread custom of "shaking hands"; "striking hands" signified the clenching of a bargain or agreement (Prov 6 1 RV); as a solemn pledge the hand was placed under the thigh of the person to whom it was given (Gen 24 2; 47 29); plucking the hand out of the bosom was a sign of action (Ps 74 11); clapping the hands, of rejoicing (2 K 11 12; Ps 47 1; 98 8; Isa 55 12), also of ridicule, contempt and rejoicing over one (Job 27 23; Lam 2 15; Nah 3 19). We read of "beckoning with the hand" (Lk 5 7; Jn 13 24), preliminary to speaking (Acts 12 17; 13 16; 19 33; 21 40; 26 1, he "stretched forth his hand"); drooping of the hands indicated failure, weakness or distress (He 12 12; cf Isa 35 3; Ecclus 25 23); washing the hands (publicly) was a declaration of innocence, "of freedom from complicity" (Dt 21 6.7; Mt 27 24).

Mohammedans Praying in the Mosque at Damascus.

The head lifted up was a sign of arrogance or pride (Ps 83 2); of exaltation, or recovery from trouble, etc (Jgs 8 28; Ps 27 6; 110 7; Zec 1 21); to cover the head was a symbol of grief or mourning (2 S 15 30; Est 6 12; Jer 14 3), also putting the hand on the head (2 S 13 19; Jer 2 37), or ashes, dust or earth (Josh 7 6; 1 S 4 12; 2 S 1 2; 13 19; Est 4 1); wagging (or shaking) the head expressed contempt or malicious enjoyment (Job 16 4; Ps 64 8; Jer 18 16; Lam 2 15; with "hissing," cf Mt 27 39; Mk 15 29; cf Ps 22 7; 44 14; 109 25; Jer 48 27).

Uncovering the feet was a sign of grief (2 S 15 30; Isa 20 2.4); lifting up the heel against one was a symbol of opposition (Ps 41 9; Jn 13 18); shaking the dust from the feet, of freeing from responsibility and of complete rejection (Mt 10 14; Acts 13 51; at Corinth Paul "shook out his raiment," Acts 18 6); strong joyous feeling found (as elsewhere) expression in dancing (Jgs 11 34; 21 21; 1 S 18 6; Jer 31 4.13), before Jeh (Ex 15 20; 2 S 6 14.16).

Shooting out the lip was an expression of contempt (Ps 22 7); to incline the ear signified attention (Ps 45 10); rending the garments expressed the sense of horror (as in the presence of disaster, blasphemy, etc) (Nu 14 6; Josh 7 6; 1 S 4 12; 2 S 1 2; 13 19; 15 32; Mt 26 65; Acts 14 14); the smile indicated favor and gave confidence (Job 29 24); lifting up the eyelids was a sign of pride (Prov 30 13); Isaiah speaks also of the "outstretched necks and wanton eyes" of the haughty daughters of Zion, "walking and mincing as they go, and making a tinkling with their feet" (Isa 3 16). The perverse man "winketh with his eyes . . . . speaketh with his feet . . . . maketh signs with his fingers" (Prov 6 13).

It is interesting to note the gestures ascribed in the Gospels to Jesus. The expression of His eyes is often referred to; we read how He "lifted up his eyes on his disciples" before pronouncing the Beatitudes, indicating a loving regard for them (Lk 6 20); how He "looked upon" the young ruler and "loved him," and, with another expressive "look" (round about)—a sad look—said, "How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God" (Mk 10 21.23); how He "looked up to heaven" before He blessed and brake the loaves (Mt 14 19; Mk 6 41; Lk 9 16); also before healing (Mk 7 34); how He "looked round" on His adversaries in the synagogue (Lk 6 10), "with anger, being grieved at the hardening of their heart" (Mk 3 5); how He "turned and looked upon Peter" so that he remembered his boasting and fall, and went out and wept bitterly (Lk 22 61); we read also how He took a little child into His arms and held him up as an example to His disciples (Mk 9 36), and how He "took [little children] in his arms, and blessed them, laying his hands upon them" (Mk 10 16); how He "stooped down, and with his finger wrote on the ground" when the woman accused of adultery was brought to Him, then "lifted up himself" and spake, again "stooped down, and with his finger wrote on the ground," till the woman's accusers had departed one by one, condemned and ashamed, when He again "lifted up himself" and sent the woman away (Jn 8 6 ff); how on His way to the tomb of Lazarus, He was agitated, AV and RV "was troubled," m "troubled himself." Meyer has "shuddered." Some tr "shook himself" (Jn 11 33). See, further, ATTITUDES.

GET, GETTING: A great many Heb words are in the OT tr^d "get," "got," etc. The word "get" has two meanings: (1) with the idea of movement, "to go," etc; (2) with that of acquisition, "to gain," "obtain," etc. (1) In the first sense the most frequent words are bō', "to come, or go in" (Gen 45 17; 1 S 22 5, etc); yālakh "to go on" (Gen 12 1; 22 2; Ex 5 4; Jer 5 5, etc); yāradh, "to go down" (Gen 42 2; Joel 3 13); 'ālāh, "to go up" (Gen 44 17; Isa 40 9; Jer 49 31, etc). Other words are nūdh, "to move off" (Jer 49 30 AV; Dnl 4 14); nāsā', "to remove" (Nu 14 25); yāçā', "to go out" (Gen 19 14; 31 13; Ex 11 8). (2) In the sense of acquisition, the words most frequently tr^d "get," etc, are 'āsāh, "to do," "to make" (Gen 12 5; 31 1; Dt 8 17.18); ķānāh, "to get," "obtain" (Gen 4 1; Prov 4 5.7; Eccl 2 7 AV, RV "bought"; Jer 13 1, RV "buy"); māçā' "to find" (Nu 31 50; 2 S 20 6); rākhash, "to acquire," "gain" (Gen 31 18; 36 6 AV, RV "gathered"; 46 6).

Getting is the tr of pō'al (Prov 21 6), of ķinyān "obtaining" (Gen 31 18; Prov 4 7, ERV text and ARV m "all thou hast gotten"). In the NT "get" in the first sense is the tr of exérchomai, "to go out or forth" (Lk 13 31; Acts 7 3; 22 18); of éxeimi, "to go out or forth" (Acts 27 43); of katabaínō, "to go down" (Acts 10 20); hupágō, "to go away or under," "Get . . . . behind" (Mt 16 23; Lk 4 8 AV, "Get . . . . hence"; Mt 4 10). The only separate word tr^d "get" in the second sense is heurískō, "to begin to find" (usually tr^d "find") (Lk 9 12 AV, "that they may go . . . . and get victuals").

For "get" RV has "mount" (Dt 28 43), "buy" (Prov 17 16; Jer 13 1; 19 1); for "get you down" (Joel 3 13), "tread ye," m "get you down"; "get" for "possess" (Lk 18 12); "get them away" for "gather themselves together" (Ps 104 22); "get us" for "apply" (Ps 90 12); "let us get grain" for "therefore we take up corn for them," and for "that we might buy corn" (Neh 5 2.3); "get you no" for "provide neither" (Mt 10 9); "getteth prudence" for "is prudent," m "dealeth prudently" (Prov 15 5); "getteth" for "coveteth" (Hab 2 9).

GETHER, gē'thẽr (גֶּתֶר, gether): In Gen 10 23 named as one of the 4 sons of Aram. In 1 Ch 1 17 mentioned simply among the sons of Shem.

GETHSEMANE, geth-sem'a-nē̆ (Γεθσημανεί, Gethsēmaneí [for other spellings and accents see Thayer, s.v.]; probably from the Aram. גַּת שְׁמָנִים, gath shemānīm, "oil press"): Mentioned (Mt 26 36; Mk 14 32) as a place (chōríon), m "enclosed piece of ground," to which Jesus and the disciples retired after the last supper; in Jn 18 1 it is described as a "garden" (κῆπος, kē̃pos), while Lk (22 40) simply says "place" (τόπος, tópos). From Jn 18 1 it is evident that it was across the Kidron, and from Lk 22 39, that it was on the Mount of Olives. Very possibly (Lk 21 37; 22 39) it was a spot where Jesus habitually lodged when visiting Jerus. The owner—whom conjecture suggests as Mary the mother of Mark—must have given Jesus and His disciples special right of entry to the spot.

Gethsemane.

Tradition, dating from the 4th cent., has fixed on a place some 50 yds. E. of the bridge across the Kidron as the site. In this walled-in enclosure once of greater extent, now primly laid out with garden beds, by the owners—the Franciscans—are eight old olive trees supposed to date from the time of Our Lord. They are certainly old, they appeared venerable to the traveler Maundrell more than two centuries ago, but that they go back to the time claimed is impossible, for Jos states (BJ, VI, i, 1) that Titus cut down all the trees in the neighborhood of Jerus at the time of the siege. Some 100 yds. farther N. is the "Grotto of the Agony," a cave or cistern supposed to be the spot "about a stone's cast" to which Our Lord retired (Lk 22 41). The Greeks have a rival garden in the neighborhood, and a little higher up the hill is a large Russian church. The traditional site may be somewhere near the correct one, though one would think too near the public road for retirement, but the contours of the hill slopes must have so much changed their forms in the troublous times of the first and second centuries, and the loose stone walls of such enclosures are of so temporary a character, that it is impossible that the site is exact. Sentiment, repelled by the artificiality of the modern garden, tempts the visitor to look for a more suitable and less artificial spot farther up the valley. Yet the sweet simplicity with which the Garden is kept, with its carefully guarded old olive trees and its flower beds, and the kindliness of the monks who have charge of it, make it a most impressive place for meditation.

GEUEL, gū′el, gė̄-ū′el (גְּאוּאֵל, gᵉ'ū'ēl, "majesty of God"): The spy from the tribe of Gad (Nu 13 15), sent by Moses to spy out the land of Canaan.

GEZER, gē′zẽr (גֶּזֶר, gezer): A city of great military importance in ancient times, the site of which has recently been thoroughly explored. The excavations at this spot are the most thorough and extensive of any in Pal, and have not only done much to confirm the history of the place, as known from Bib. and other sources, but have also thrown a flood of light upon the general history, civilization and religion of Pal in pre-Israelite and Israelitish times.

1. The Discovery and Position of the Site

The long-lost site of Gezer was discovered by M. Clermont-Ganneau in 1873, and his suggestion that the modern name for the place, Tell Jezer (or Tell el Jezereh) was a survival of the ancient name was confirmed by his further discovery of three bilingual inscriptions, in Heb and Gr, cut on surfaces of rock by a certain Alkios, apparently once the governor of the city; in one of them occurred the expression "the boundary of Gezer."

The natural features and the position of Tell Jezer abundantly explain the extreme importance of Gezer in ancient times. The buried remains crown a narrow hill, running from N.W. to S.E., about 1,700 ft. long by 300 to 500 ft. broad. The approach is steep on every side, and in early times, before the accumulation around the sides of the rubbish of some millenniums, must have been much more so. The hill stands, like an outpost, projecting into the great plain, and is connected with the low hills behind it, part of the Shephelah, with but a narrow neck. At the foot of the hill runs a great high road from Egypt to Syria; to the N. lies the Vale of Aijalon, across which runs the modern carriage road to Jerus, and up which ran the great high road, by the Beth-horons, to the plateau N. of Jerus; to the S. lies the Vale of Sorek, where stood Beth-shemesh, and along which went a great highway from the country of the Philis to the hill country of Judah. Today the Jerus-Jaffa railway, after sweeping some miles away in the plain round the whole western and southern sides of the site, passes along this open vale to plunge into the narrow defile—the Wady Isma'in, which it follows to Jerus. From the summit of the Tell, a vast expanse of country is visible between the long blue line of the Mediterranean to the W., and the abrupt and lofty mountains of Judah to the E. That it has been all through history the scene of military contest is fully understood when its strategic position is appreciated; no military leader even today, if holding the highlands of Pal against invasion, could afford to neglect such an outpost.

2. History of Gezer

Although the excavation of the site shows that it was occupied by a high civilization and a considerable population at an extremely early period, the first historical mention is in the list of the Palestinian cities captured by Tahutmes III (XVIIIth Dynasty, about 1500 BC). From this time it was probably under Egyp governors (the Egyp remains at all periods are considerable), but from the Am Tab, a century or so later, we learn that Egyp influence was then on the wane. Three of these famous clay tablets are dated from Gezer itself and are written in the name of the governor Yapaḥi; he was then hard pressed by the Khabiri, and he appealed for help in vain to Egypt. In other letters belonging to this series, there are references to this city. In one, a certain freebooter named Lapaya makes excuses that he had broken into the city. He "has been slandered. Is it an offence that he has entered Gazri and levied the people?" (no. CCXL, Petrie's tr).

In the well-known "Song of Triumph" of Meren-ptah, who is considered by many to be the Pharaoh of the Exodus, occurs the expression "Gezer is taken." (In connection with this it is interesting to notice that an ivory pectoral with the cartouche of Meren-ptah was unearthed at Gezer.)

In the time of Joshua's invasion a certain "king of Gezer" named Horam (הֹרָם, hōrām, but in LXX Αἰλάμ, Ailám, or Ἐλάμ, Elám) came to the assistance of Lachish against the Israelites, but was slain (Josh 10 33). Gezer was taken, but the Canaanites were not driven out, but remained in servitude (Josh 16 10; Jgs 1 29). The city became one of the towns on the southern border of Ephraim (Josh 16 3), but was assigned to the Kohath clan of the Levites (21 21). In 2 S 5 25 (AV "Gazer") we read that David chased the Philis after their defeat in the valley of Rephaim "from Geba until thou come to Gezer," showing that this was on the frontier of the Phili territory; and in 1 Ch 20 4 it states, "There arose war at Gezer with the Philis; then Sibbecai the Hushathite slew Sippai, of the sons of the giant; and they were subdued." In the corresponding account in 2 S 21 18 the scene of this event is said to be Gob, which is probably a copyist's error—גוב for גזר. According to Jos (Ant, VIII, vi, 1), at the commencement of Solomon's reign Gezer was in the hands of the Philis, which may explain 1 K 9 16, where it is stated that a certain Pharaoh, whose daughter Solomon married, captured and burnt Gezer and gave the site to his daughter. Solomon rebuilt it (ver 17). There are no further references to Gezer during the later Jewish monarchy, but there are several during the Maccabean period. Judas pursued Gorgias to "Gazara and into the plains of Idumaea and Azotis and Jamnia" (1 Macc 4 15); Bacchides, after his defeat by Jonathan, "fortified also the city of Beth-sura, and Gazara, and the tower, and put forces in them and provision of victuals" (1 Macc 9 52 AV); a little later Simon "camped against Gazara and besieged it round about; he made also an engine of war, and set it by the city and battered a certain tower, and took it" (1 Macc 13 43 AV), after which he purified it (vs 47.48). From Jos (Ant, XIII, viii, 2) we gather that Antiochus had taken Gezer from the Jews.

The governor, Alkios, who made the bilingual inscriptions, may come in about this time or a little later; the rock inscriptions, of which half a dozen are now known, give no information regarding their date.

In the period of the Crusades this site, under the name "Mount Gisart," was a crusading fort and gave its name to a family. Here King Baldwin IV gained a victory over Saladin in 1177, and in 1191 the latter monarch camped here while conducting some fruitless negotiations with King Richard Cœur de Lion. In 1495 a skirmish occurred here between the governor of Jerus and certain turbulent Bedouin. The history of Gezer, as known, is thus one of battles and sieges extending over at least 3,000 years; from the archaeological remains we may infer that its history was similar for at least 1,000 years earlier.

In 1904 the Pal Exploration Fund of England obtained a "permit" for the excavation of Tell Jezer.

3. History of the Excavations

The whole site was the private property of certain Europeans, whose agent, living much of the time on the Tell itself, was himself deeply interested in the excavations, so that unusually favorable conditions obtained for the work. Mr. (now Professor) R. A. Stewart Macalister, M.A., was sent out, and for 3 years (1904–7) he instituted an examination of the hidden remains in the mound, after a manner, till then, unexampled in Pal exploration. His ambition was to turn over every cubic foot of soil down to the original rock, so that nothing of importance could be overlooked. As at the expiration of the original "permit" much remained unexplored, application was made to the authorities for a second one, and, at the end of 1907, Mr. Macalister embarked on a further 2 years of digging. Altogether he worked for the greater part of 5 years, except for necessary interruptions of the work due to unfavorable weather. Some two-thirds of the total accumulated débris on the mound was ransacked, and besides this, many hundreds of tombs, caves and other antiquarian remains in the neighborhood were thoroughly explored.

4. Chief Results of the Explorations

It was found that the original bare rock surface of the hill was crowned with buried remains, in some parts 20 and 30 ft. deep, made up of the débris of all the cities which had stood on the site during three or four thousand years; on the part excavated there were no remains so late as the commencement of the Christian era, the Gezer of that time, and the crusading fort, being built on a neighboring site. The earliest inhabitants were Troglodytes living in the many caves which riddled the hill surface; they were apparently a non-Sem race, and there was some evidence that they at least knew of cremation. These, or a race soon after—the earliest Semites—inclosed the hilltop with high earth rampart faced with rough stones—the earliest "walls" going back at least before 3000 BC. At an early period—probably about 3000 BC—a race with a relatively high civilization fortified the whole hilltop with a powerful and remarkably well-built wall, 14 ft. thick, with narrow towers of short projection at intervals of 90 ft. At a point on the S. side of this was unearthed a very remarkable, massive, brick gateway (all the other walls and buildings are of stone), with towers on each side still standing to the height of 16 ft., but evidently once much higher. This gate showed a strong Egyp influence at work long before the first historic reference (XVIIIth Dynasty), for both gateway and wall to which it belonged had been ruined at an early date, the former indeed, after its destruction, was overlaid by the buildings of a city, which from its datable objects—scarabs, etc—must have belonged to the time of Amenhotep III, i.e. as early as 1500 BC.

The later wall, built, we may conclude, soon after the ruin of the former, and therefore about 1500 BC, was also a powerful construction and must have existed considerably over a thousand years, down, indeed, till 100 BC at least, when Gezer disappears from history as a fortified site. These walls inclosed a larger area than either of the previous ones; they show signs of destruction and repairs, and Mr. Macalister is of the opinion that some of the extensive repairs—in one place a gap of 150 ft.—and the 28 inserted towers are the work of Solomon (1 K 9 17). This wall must have existed in use through all we know of Gezer from Bible sources. When, from the ruined remains, we reconstruct in imagination these mighty ramparts, we need not wonder that the Hebrews, fresh from long wanderings in the wilderness, found it no easy task to capture cities so fortified as was this (Nu 13 28; Dt 1 28).

Scarab with Name of Amenhotep III, from Gezer.
[From Bible Side-Lights from the Mound of Gezer.]

The foundations of a powerful building, which were found inserted in a gap in the southern walls, turned out conclusively to be the palace of Simon Maccabaeus—who captured the city (1 Macc 13 43)—a graffito being found upon one of its stones running thus:

Πάμπρα(s) Σιμῶνος κατεπάγη (?) π(ῦρ) βασίλειον

which seems to mean, "Pamphras, may he bring down [fire] on the palace of Simon."

Within the city walls the foundations of some seven or eight cities of various successive periods were found, superimposed one above the other. The city's best days appear to have been shortly before the time of Joshua; the next, perhaps, at the time of the Judges. With the period to which we should probably assign the arrival of the Hebrews, there is a great increase in the population, the hitherto inviolate environs of the "temple" being encroached upon by private dwellings: an interesting commentary on Josh 16 10.

The great "High Place" which was uncovered is one of unique interest, and its discovery has thrown a flood of light upon the religion of the early Canaanites, that religion—"the worship of Baal and Ashteroth"—which was the great rival of the purer religion of Israel. This Ba'al temple, or bāmōth, consisted of a row of 8 maççēbhōth or rude stone pillars ranging in height from 5 ft. 5 in. to 10 ft. 9 in. (see HIGH PLACE; PILLAR), together with a curious trough which may have been a socket for the 'Ăshērāh (see ASHERAH), or some kind of altar. The area around these pillars had a kind of rough floor of consolidated earth under which were found a number of large jars containing infant bones, considered to be the remains of infant sacrifice. In close proximity to this "temple" was a double cave, the construction of which strongly suggested that it had been arranged for the giving of oracles. This high place had been used for very many centuries; the maççēbhōth were not all of one period but had gradually been increased from one to seven, and an eighth of a more definitely sculptured form—as a simulacrum priapi—had been added some time later. In the accumulated rubbish around these pillars were found enormous numbers of small stone phallic images, together with pottery plaques of Astarte, made with rude exaggeration of the sexual organs (see Baal; Ashteroth).

Sacrificed Infant Buried in a Jar at Gezer. [From Bible Side-Lights from the Mound of Gezer.]

Another monument of great interest—and high antiquity—was the great rock-cut tunnel. It is about 23 ft. high, and 13 ft. wide, and descends by 80 steps, 94½ ft. through the solid rock, to a cave in which there is a spring. It is very similar to the great tunnel known as "Warren's tunnel and shaft" which was clearly constructed by the early Jebusites to reach from within the city's walls to the fountain of Gihon (see Siloam; Zion). This Gezer tunnel must date at least to 2000 BC; it is evident from the nature of the accumulated débris which blocked its mouth that it was actually abandoned about 1400 BC. Its antiquity is confirmed by the fact that it was evidently excavated with flint knives.

At a much later period in history, in that of the Maccabees, the water supply of the city, in time of siege, at any rate, was largely dependent on an enormous open cistern which Mr. Macalister cleared of earth and found capable of containing 2,000,000 gallons of water. Among the smaller "finds" which throw light upon the Bible history may be mentioned two much broken, cuneiform tablets, both referring to land contracts, which, from the names of the eponyms, can be dated to 651 and 649 BC respectively. They therefore belong to the time of the last, and one of the greatest, of the Assyr monarchs, Ashurbanipal, the "noble Osnappar" of Ezr 4 10, and they show that he was not only a great conqueror, but that in Pal he had an organized government and that legal civil business was transacted in the language of Assyria.

The illumination of OT history which the excavations of Gezer have afforded can here be only hinted at, but references to it will occur in many of the articles in other parts of this Encyclopaedia.

Literature.—In Bible Side-Lights from the Mound of Gezer Professor R. A. S. Macalister has described in a popular form with illustrations some of his most remarkable discoveries; while in the Memoirs of the Excavations at Gezer (1912), published by the Palestine Exploration Fund, Professor Macalister deals with the subject exhaustively.

GEZRITES, gez′rīts. See Girzites.

GHOST, gōst (נֶפֶשׁ, nephesh; πνεῦμα, pneúma): "Ghost," the middle-Eng. word for "breath," "spirit," appears in AV as the tr of nephesh ("breath," "the breath of life," animal soul or spirit, the vital principle, hence "life"), in two places of the OT, viz. Job 11 20, "the giving up of the ghost" (so RV), and Jer 15 9, "She hath given up the ghost"; *gāwa*ʿ, "to gasp out," "expire" (die), is also several times so tr^{d} (Gen 25 8.17; 35 29; 49 33; Job 3 11; 10 18; 13 19; 14 10; Lam 1 19). In Apoc (Tob 14 11) psuchḗ is tr^{d} in the same way as nephesh in the OT, and in 2 Macc 3 31, en eschátē pnoḗ is rendered "give up the ghost," RV "quite at the last gasp."

In the NT "to give up the ghost" is the tr of ekpnéō, "to breathe out" (Mk 15 37.39; Lk 23 46; so RV); of ekpsúchō, "to breathe out," "expire" (Acts 5 5.10; 12 23); in Mt 27 50, aphḗken tò pneúma, and in Jn 19 30, parédōken tò pneúma, are rendered respectively, "yielded" and "gave up the ghost," RV "yielded up his spirit," "gave up his spirit."

"The Holy Ghost" is also frequent in AV; in ARV it is invariably changed to "Holy Spirit," in ERV sometimes only, chiefly in the Gospels. See Holy Spirit; Spirit.

GHOST, HOLY. See Holy Spirit.

GIAH, gī′a (גִּיחַ, gī^{a}ḥ): An unidentified place on the route followed by Abner in his flight, pursued by Joab (2 S 2 24). LXX renders Gaí, corresponding to the Heb gē, "valley." The form gī^{a}ḥ may be due to corruption of the text.

GIANTS, jī′ants: The word appears in AV as the tr of the Heb words נְפִילִים, n^{e}phīlīm (Gen 6 4; Nu 13 33); רְפָאִים, r^{e}phā'īm (Dt 2 11.20; 3 11.13; Josh 12 4, etc); רָפָא, rāphā' (1 Ch 20 4.6.8), or רָפָה, rāphāh (2 S 21 16.18.20.22); in one instance of גִּבּוֹר, gibbōr, lit. "mighty one" (Job 16 14).

In the first two cases RV changes "giants" into the Heb words "Nephilim," n^{e}phīlīm, and "Rephaim," r^{e}phā'īm, respectively (see these words). The "Nephilim" of Gen 6 4 are not to be confounded with the "mighty men" subsequently described as the offspring of the unlawful marriages of "the sons of God" and "the daughters of men." It is told that they overspread the earth prior to these unhallowed unions. That the word, whatever its etymology, bears the sense of men of immense stature is evident from the later passages, Nu 13 33. The same is true of the "Rephaim," as shown by the instance of Og (Dt 3 11; Josh 12 4). There is no doubt about the meaning of the word in the case of the giants mentioned in 2 S 21 and 1 Ch 20. See also Antediluvians.

GIBBAR, gib′är (גִּבָּר, gibbār, "hero"): In Ezr 2 20 the "children of Gibbar" are mentioned among those who returned with Zerubbabel. The ∥ passage (Neh 7 25) has "children of Gibeon."

GIBBETHON, gib′e-thon (גִּבְּתוֹן, gibb^{e}thōn): A city in the territory of Dan in the plain named with Eltekeh and Baalath (Josh 19 44), and assigned to the Kohathite Levites (21 23). Later we find it in the hands of the Philis; and it was while besieging the city that Nadab was slain by Baasha (1 K 15 27). After 25 years Omri, the general of Baasha, was here made king of the army when news reached them of Zimri's regicide (1 K 16 15 ff). It may possibly be identified with Kibbiah, which lies about 16 miles S.E. of Jaffa; but no certain identification is possible.

GIBEA, gib′ē-a (גִּבְעָא, *gibh*ʿ*ā'*, "hill"): A grandson of Caleb (1 Ch 2 49). His father was Sheva, whose mother was Maacah, Caleb's concubine (ver 48).

GIBEAH, gib′ē-a (גִּבְעָה, gibhʿāh, "hill"): The Heb word denotes generally an eminence or hill, in distinction from har, which is used for mountain, or mountain range. It occurs, however, in two instances, as a place-name. Under Geba (q.v.) we have seen that Geba, Gibeah, and Gibeon are liable to be confused. This arises from their resemblance in form and meaning.

(1) An unidentified city in the territory of Judah (Josh 15 57). It is named in the group containing Carmel, Ziph and Kain; it is therefore probably to be sought to the S.E. of Hebron. It may be one of the two villages mentioned by Onom (s.v. "Gabathōn"), Gabaa and Gabatha, in the E. of the Daroma. It is probably identical with Gibeah mentioned in 2 Ch 13 2.

1. History

(2) A city described as belonging to Benjamin (Josh 18 28; Jgs 19 14), Gibeah of Benjamin (1 S 13 2.15; 14 16), Gibeah of the children of Benjamin (2 S 23 29), Gibeah of Saul (1 S 11 4; Isa 10 29), and possibly, also, Gibeah of God (1 S 10 5 m); see Gibeath, 4. The narrative in which it first appears is one of extraordinary and tragic interest, casting priceless light on the conditions prevailing in those days when "there was no king in Israel" (Jgs 19 ff). A Levite sojourning on the farther side of Mt. Ephraim was deserted by his concubine who returned to her father's house in Beth-lehem-judah. Thither he went to persuade her to return. Hospitably entertained by her father, he tarried till the afternoon of the fifth day. The evening was nigh when they came over against Jebus—Jerusalem—but, rejecting his servant's suggestion that they should lodge in this "city of a stranger"—i.e. the Jebusite—the Levite pressed on, and when they were near to Gibeah the sun set. They entered the city and sat down in the street. The laws of hospitality today do not compel the entertainment of strangers who arrive after sunset. But it may have been through disregard of all law that they were left unbefriended. An old man from Mt. Ephraim took pity on them, invited them to his house, and made himself responsible for their necessities. Then follows the horrible story of outrage upon the Levite's concubine; the way in which he made known his wrongs to Israel; and the terrible revenge exacted from the Benjamites, who would not give up to justice the miscreants of Gibeah.

Gibeah was the home of Saul, the first king of Israel, and thither he returned after his election at Mizpah (1 S 10 26). From Gibeah he summoned Israel to assemble for the relief of Jabesh-gilead, which was threatened by Nahash the Ammonite (1 S 11 4 ff). In the wars of Saul with the Philis, Gibeah seems to have played a conspicuous part (1 S 13 15). Here were exposed the bodies of the seven sons of Saul, slain by David's orders, to appease the Gibeonites, furnishing the occasion for Rizpah's pathetic vigil (2 S 21 1 ff). Gibeah is mentioned in the description of the Assyr advance on Jerus (Isa 10 29).

2. Identification

The site now generally accepted as that of Gibeah is on Teleil el-Fūl, an artificial mound about 4 miles N. of Jerus, a short distance E. of the high road to Shechem. A little way N. of Teleil el-Fūl, the high road bifurcates, one branch turning eastward to Jebaʿ, i.e. Geba (which should be read instead of "Gibeah" in Jgs 20 31); the other continuing northward to Bethel. Not far from the parting of the ways, on the road to Jebaʿ lies er-Rām, corresponding to Ramah (Jgs 19 13). At Gibeah, about 30 furlongs from Jerus, Titus encamped for the night on his advance against the city from the N. Teleil el-Fūl quite satisfactorily suits all the data here indicated.

The words in Jgs 20 33 rendered by AV "the meadows of Gibeah," RV "Maareh-geba"—simply transliterating—and RVm "the meadow of Geba" (or Gibeah), by a slight emendation of the text, read "from the west of Gibeah," which is certainly correct.

GIBEATH, gib′ē-ath (גִּבְעַת, gibhʿath): This is the status constructus of the foregoing (Gibeah). It is found in several compound place-names.

(1) Gibeath-ha-araloth (גִּבְעַת הָעֲרָלוֹת, gibhʿath hāʿărālōth). EV trs lit. "hill of the foreskins"; but the margins suggest the proper name. Here the Israelites were circumcised after the passage of the Jordan (Josh 5 3). The place was therefore between that river and Jericho.

(2) Gibeath Phinehas (גִּבְעַת פִּינְחָס, gibhʿath pīnᵉḥāṣ), the burial place of Eleazar the son of Aaron in Mt. Ephraim (Josh 24 33 AV "a hill that pertained to Phinehas," RV "the hill of Phinehas," RVm "Gibeah of Phinehas"). Conder would identify it with 'Awertah in the plain of Makhneh, not far from Nablūs, where "the Samaritans show the tombs of Phinehas and Eleazar, Abishuah and Ithamar" (Tent Work, 41 f). The "tomb of Eleazar" is 18 ft. long, plastered all over and shaded by a splendid terebinth." Guérin places it at Jībia, 3 miles N. of Ḳaryat el-ʿAnab (Judée, III, 37 f; Samarie, 106 ff). There is no certainty.

(3) Gibeath hammoreh (גִּבְעַת הַמּוֹרֶה, gibhʿath ha-mōreh), a hill on the N. side of the valley from the camp of Gideon, beside which lay the Midianites (Jgs 7 1, EV "the hill of Moreh"; the Heb is lit. "hill of the teacher"). It is probably identical with Jebel Duḥy, which rises on the N. of the Vale of Jezreel. Moore (Judges, 200) mistakenly calls the mountain Nabī Daḥī. This is, of course, the name of the "prophet" whose shrine crowns the hill. See Moreh.

(4) Gibeath ha-Elohim (גִּבְעַת הָאֱלֹהִים, gibhʿath hā-'ĕlōhīm), the place where Saul, after leaving Samuel, met the company of prophets, and prophesied with them (1 S 10 5.10). It is defined as the place "where is the garrison [or pillar] of the Philis." This may be intended to distinguish it from Gibeah (2), with which it is often identified. In this case it may be represented by the modern Ramallah, about 10 miles N. of Jerus. See also Tabor.

(5) Gibeath ha-Hachilah (1 S 23 19; 26 1) is identical with Hachilah (q.v.).

(6) Gibeath Ammah (2 S 2 24) is identical with Ammah (q.v.).

(7) Gibeath Gareb (Jer 31 39) is identical with Gareb (q.v.).

GIBEATHITE, gib′ē-ath-īt. See Shemaah.

GIBEON, gib′ē-un (גִּבְעוֹן, gibhʿōn): One of the royal cities of the Hivites (Josh 9 7). It was a greater city than Ai; and its inhabitants were reputed mighty men (10 2). It fell within the territory allotted to Benjamin (18 25), and was one of the cities given to the Levites (21 17).

1. The Gibeonites

By a stratagem the Gibeonites secured for themselves and their allies in Chephirah, Beeroth and Kiriath-jearim immunity from attack by the Israelites. Terrified by the fate of Jericho and Ai, a company disguised as ambassadors from a far country, their garments and shoes worn, and their provisions moldy as from the length of their journey, went to Joshua at Gilgal, and persuaded him and the princes of Israel to make a covenant with them. Three days later the deception was discovered and the wrath of the congregation of Israel aroused. In virtue of the covenant their lives were secured; but for their duplicity Joshua cursed them, and condemned them to be bondmen, "hewers of wood and drawers of water for the house of my God" (Josh 9 23), "for the congregation and for the altar of the Lord" (ver 27 AV). This points to their employment in the sanctuary; and possibly may shed some light on the massacre of the Gibeonites by Saul (2 S 21 1 f). The rest of the Canaanites resented the defection of the Hivites which so greatly weakened the forces for defence, and, headed by Adoni-zedek of Jerus, they assembled to wreak vengeance on Gibeon. The threatened city appealed to Joshua, who made a swift night march, fell suddenly upon the confederates, routed them, and "chased them by the way of the ascent of Beth-horon, and smote them to Azekah, and unto Makkedah" (Josh 10 1 ff).

A three years' famine in the days of David was attributed to God's anger at the unexpiated crime of Saul in slaying the Gibeonites. He did this "in his zeal for . . . . Israel and Judah," who may have fretted at the inconvenience of having the Gibeonites among them. The latter believed that Saul's desire was to destroy them utterly. When David tried to arrange matters with them they stood upon their ancient rights, claiming life for life. They would take no blood money: they demanded blood from the family of the slayer of their people. This demand David could not resist, and handed over to them seven sons of Saul (2 S 21 1 ff).

2. The Champions

The army of Ishbosheth under Abner, and that of David under Joab, met at the pool of Gibeon. An attempt to settle the quarrel, by means of 12 champions on either side, failed, as each man slew his fellow, and the 24 perished side by side. A "sore battle" ensued in which Abner was beaten; he was pursued by the fleet-footed Asahel, brother of Joab, whom he slew. See HELKATH-HAZZURIM.

Possibly we should read "Gibeon" instead of "Geba" in 2 S 5 25, as in the ‖ passage, 1 Ch 14 16 (HDB, s.v.) From Baal-perazim David was to make a circuit and fall upon the Philis who were encamped in the plain of Rephaim W. of Jerus. Perhaps, however, we should read "Gibeah" in both places. Cheyne (EB, s.v.) thinks the hill town of Baal-perazim may be intended.

3. Murder of Amasa

When, after the death of Absalom and the suppression of his rebellion, Bichri raised the standard of revolt, Amasa was sent to call out the men of Judah against him. Tarrying longer than the time appointed, there was danger lest Bichri might have opportunity to strengthen his position; so David dispatched Abishai and the troops that were with him to attack Bichri at once. Joab went with this expedition. Obviously he could never be content with a second place. The force of Amasa was met at "the great stone of Gibeon." There Joab treacherously slew that unsuspecting general, and, himself assuming command, stamped out the rebellion with his accustomed thoroughness (2 S 20 4 ff). "The great stone" appears to have been well known, and may have possessed some religious character.

4. The Sanctuary

Gibeon was the seat of an ancient sanctuary, called in 1 K 3 4 "the great high place." Here, according to 2 Ch 1 3, was the tabernacle made in the wilderness—but see 1 K 8 4. It was the scene of Solomon's great sacrifice after which he slept in the sanctuary and dreamed his famous dream (1 K 3 4 ff; 9 2; 2 Ch 1 3.13, etc).

By "the great waters that are in Gibeon" Johanan overtook Ishmael the son of Nethaniah, and freed the captives he had taken from Mizpah (Jer 41 11 ff). Among those who returned with Zerubbabel were 95 "children of Gibeon" (Neh 7 25; cf 3 7). At Gibeon Cestius Gallus encamped when marching against Jerus from Antipatris (BJ, II, xix, 1).

5. Identification and Description

The ancient city is represented by the modern village el-Jīb. It is fully 5 miles N.W. of Jerus, and about a mile N. of Neby Samwīl, on a double knoll, with terraced slopes, but rocky and precipitous to the E. The village stands amid striking remains of antiquity. About a hundred paces from the village to the E. is a large reservoir with a spring. Lower down, among the olives, are the remains of another and larger reservoir, which collected the overflow from the first. This is probably the "pool" of 2 S 2 13, and "the great waters" of Jer 41 12. El-Jīb stands in the midst of a rich upland plain not far S. of the great pass which goes down by way of the Beth-horons into the vale of Aijalon.

GIBEONITES, gib'ē-un-īts. Inhabitants of GIBEON (q.v.).

GIBLITES, gib'līts. See GEBALITES.

GIDDALTI, gi-dal'tī (גִּדַּלְתִּי, giddaltī, "I magnify [God]"): A son of Heman (1 Ch 25 4.29), one of David's musicians.

GIDDEL, gid'el (גִּדֵּל, giddēl, "very great," "stout"):

(1) The name of the head of a family of Nethinim (Ezr 2 47 = Neh 7 49 = 1 Esd 5 30 [here as Cathua]).

(2) The name of the head of a family of Solomon's servants (Ezr 2 56 = Neh 7 58 = 1 Esd 5 33 [here Isdael]).

GIDEON, gid'ē-un (גִּדְעוֹן, gidh'ōn, "cutter down," "feller" or "hewer"): Also named Jerubbaal (Jgs 6 32) and Jerubbesheth (2 S 11 21), youngest son of Joash, of the clan of Abiezer in the tribe of Manasseh. His home was at Ophrah, and his family an obscure one. He became the chief leader of Manasseh and the fifth recorded judge of Israel. The record of his life is found in Jgs 6–8.

1. His Family and Home

Joash was an idolater, and sacrifices to Baal were common among the entire clan. Gideon seems to have held this worship in contempt, and to have pondered deeply the causes of Israel's reverses and the injuries wrought upon his own family by the hand of the Midianites.

2. The Midianite Oppression

The Midianites under Zebah and Zalmunna, their two greatest chiefs, accompanied by other wild tribes of the eastern desert, had gradually encroached on the territory of Israel in Central Pal. They came first as marauders and pillagers at the time of the harvests, but later they forcibly took possession of lands, and thus inflicted permanent injury and loss, esp. upon Manasseh and Ephraim. The conflicts became so numerous, the appropriation of land so flagrant, that the matter of sustenance became a serious problem (6 4). The multitude of these desert hordes and the cruelty of their depredation rendered defence difficult, and, lacking in the spirit of national unity, the Israelites were driven to dens, caves and rocky strongholds for safety (6 2). After seven years of such invasion and suffering Gideon comes upon the scene.

3. The Call of Gideon

It is probable that Gideon had already distinguished himself in resistance to the Midianites (6 12), but he now receives Divine commission to assume the leadership. Having taken his own little harvest to a secret place for threshing, that it might escape the greed of the Midianites, he is surprised while at work by a visit from the Lord in the form of an angel. However this scene (6 11 ff) and its miraculous incidents may be interpreted, there can be no question of the divineness of Gideon's call or that the voice which spoke to him was the voice of God. Neither the brooding over the death of his brothers at Tabor (8 18) nor the patriotic impulses dwelling within him can account for his assumption of leadership. Nor did he become leader at the demand of the people. He evidently had scarcely thought of himself as his country's deliverer. The call not only came to him as a surprise, but found him distrustful both of himself (6 15) and of his people (ver 13). It found him too without inclination for the task, and only his conviction that the command was of God persuaded him to assume leadership. This gives the note of accuracy to the essential facts of the story. Gideon's demand for a sign (ver 17) being answered, the food offered the messenger having been consumed by fire at the touch of his staff, Gideon acknowledged the Divine commission of his visitor, and at the place of visitation built an altar to Jeh (vs 19 ff).

4. His First Commission

The call and first commission of Gideon are closely joined. He is at once commanded to destroy the altars of Baal set up by his father at Ophrah, to build an altar to Jeh at the same place and thereon to offer one of his father's bullocks as a sacrifice (vs 25 f). There is no reason to look on this as a second version of Gideon's call. It is rather the beginning of instruction, and is deeply significant of the accuracy of the story, in that it follows the line of all revelation to God's prophets and reformers to begin their work at home. Taking ten men, under the cover of darkness, Gideon does as commanded (ver 27). The morning revealed his work and visited upon him the wrath of the people of Ophrah. They demand of Joash that he put his son to death. The answer of Joash is an ironical but valid defence of Gideon. Why should the people plead for Baal? A god should be able to plead his own cause (vs 28 ff). This defence gained for Gideon the name Jerubbaal (yᵉrubbaʽal, i.e. yārebh bō ha-baʽal, "Let Baal plead," 6 32 AV).

The time intervening between this home scene and the actual campaign against the Midianites cannot definitely be named. It is probable that it took months for Gideon even to rally the people of his own clan. The fact is that all the subsequent events of the story are somewhat confused by what looks like a double narrative in which there are apparent but not vital differences. Without ignoring this fact it is still possible to get a connected account of what actually transpired.

5. Gideon's Army

When the allied invaders were in camp on the plain of Jezreel, we find Gideon, having recruited the Abiezrites and sent messengers to the various tribes of Israel (6 34 f), pitching his camp near the Midianites. The location of the various camps of Gideon is difficult, as is the method of the recruiting of the tribes. For instance, 6 35 seems to be in direct contradiction to 7 23, and both are considered of doubtful origin. There was evidently, however, a preliminary encampment at the place of rallying. While waiting here, Gideon further tested his commission by the dry and wet fleece (6 37 ff) and, convinced of God's purpose to save Israel by his leadership, he moves his camp to the S.E. edge of the plain of Jezreel nearby the spring of Harod. From his point of vantage here he could look down on the tents of Midian. The account of the reduction of his large army from 32,000 to 300 (7 2 ff) is generally accepted as belonging to a later tradition. Neither of the tests, however, is unnatural, and the first was not unusual. According to the account, Gideon at the Lord's command first excused all the fearful. This left him with 10,000 men. This number was reduced to 300 by a test of their method of drinking. This test can easily be seen to evidence the eagerness and courage of men for battle (Jos).

6. The Midianites' Discomfiture and Flight

Having thus reduced the army and having the assurance that the Lord would deliver to him and his little band the forces of Midian, Gideon, with a servant, went by night to the edge of the camp of his enemy, and there heard the telling and interpretation of a dream which greatly encouraged him and led him to strike an immediate blow (7 9 ff). Again we find a conflict of statement between 7 20 and 7 22, but the conflict is as to detail only. Dividing his men into three equal bands, Gideon arranges that with trumpets, and lights concealed in pitchers, and with the cry, "The sword of Jeh and of Gideon!" they shall descend and charge the Midianites simultaneously from three sides. This stratagem for concealing his numbers and for terrifying the enemy succeeds, and the Midianites and their allies flee in disorder toward the Jordan (7 18 ff). The rout was complete, and the victory was intensified by the fact that in the darkness the enemy turned their swords against one another. Admitting that we have two narratives (cf 7 24; 8 3 with 8 4 ff) and that there is some difference between them in the details of the attack and the progress of the conflict, there is no need for confusion in the main line of events. One part of the fleeing enemy evidently crossed the Jordan at Succoth, being led by Zebah and Zalmunna. The superior force followed the river farther south, toward the ford of Beth-barah. Gideon sent messengers to the men of Ephraim (7 24), probably before the first attack, asking them to intercept the Midianites, should they attempt to escape by the fords in their territory.

7. Death of Oreb and Zeeb

This they did, defeating the enemy at Beth-barah and slaying the princes Oreb and Zeeb ("the Raven" and "the Wolf"). As proof of their victory and valor they brought the heads of the princes to Gideon and accused him of having discounted their bravery by not calling them earlier into the fight. But Gideon was a master of diplomacy, as well as of strategy, and won the friendship of Ephraim by magnifying their accomplishment in comparison with his own (8 1 ff).

Gideon now pursues Zebah and Zalmunna on the E. side of the river. The people on that side are still in great fear of the Midianites and refuse even to feed his army. At Succoth they say to him, "Are the hands of Zebah and Zalmunna now in thy hand, that we should give bread unto thine army?" (8 6). At Penuel he meets with the same refusal (8 8). Promising to deal with Succoth and Penuel as they deserve when he is through with his present task, Gideon pushes on with his half-famished but courageous men, overtakes the Midianites, defeats them, captures Zebah and Zalmunna, and, returning, punishes, according to his promise, both Succoth and Penuel (8 7.9.13 ff).

8. Death of Zebah and Zalmunna

Thus was the power of the Midianites and the desert hordes broken in Canaan and a forty years' peace came to Israel. But the two kings of Midian must now meet their fate as defeated warriors. They had led their forces at Tabor when the brothers of Gideon perished. So Gideon commands his young son Jether to slay them as though they were not worthy of death at a warrior's hand (8 20). The youth fearing the task, Gideon himself put them to death (8 21).

9. Gideon's Ephod The people clamored to make Gideon king. He refused, being moved possibly by a desire to maintain the theocracy. To this end he asks only the jewelry taken as spoil in the battles (8 24 ff), and with it makes an ephod, probably an image of Jeh, and places it in a house of the Lord at Ophrah. By this act it was later thought that Gideon contributed to a future idolatry of Israel. The narrative properly closes with 8 28. 10. His Death The remaining verses containing the account of Gideon's family and death (8 30 ff) and the record of events immediately subsequent to Gideon's death (8 33 ff) come from other sources than the original narrators.

GIDEONI, gid-ē-ō′nī (גִּדְעֹנִי, gidh‘ōnī): The father of Abidan who was prince of Benjamin, mentioned only in connection with the son (Nu 1 11; 2 22; 7 60.65; 10 24).

GIDOM, gī′dom (גִּדְעֹם, gidh‘ōm): The limit eastward, from Gibeah toward the wilderness, of the pursuit of Benjamin by Israel (Jgs 20 45). No name suggesting this has yet been recovered. It is not mentioned elsewhere.

GIER-EAGLE, jēr′-ē-g′l (רָחָם, rāḥām; κύκνος, kúknos, in Lev, πορφυρίων, porphuríōn, in Dt): The name applied to one of the commonest of the vultures, and not an eagle at all. The word is derived from a Heb root, meaning "to love," and was applied to the birds because mated pairs seldom separated. These were smaller birds and inferior to the largest members of the family. They nested on a solid base, lived in pairs, and not only flocked over carrion as larger species permitted, but also ate the vilest offal of all sorts, for which reason they were protected by a death penalty by one of the Pharaohs.

Gier-Eagle (Neophron percnopterus).

Because of this the birds became so frequent and daring around camps, among tent-dwellers, and in cities, that they were commonly called "Pharaoh's chickens." They are mentioned in the Bible in the lists of abominations found in Lev 11 13 and Dt 14 12 (AV "ossifrage"); 14 17 AV (RV "vulture").

GIFT, gift (מַתָּנָה, mattānāh, מִנְחָה, minḥāh, שֹׁחַד, shōḥadh; δῶρον, dōron, δωρεά, dōreá, χάρισμα, chárisma): In Gen 25 6; Ex 28 38; Nu 18 6.7.29; Ezk 20 26, etc, mattānāh, "a gift," is so rendered; minḥāh, an offering or present, used esp. of the "meat offerings," is tr^{d} "gift" (2 S 8 2.6 AV; 2 Ch 26 8), in which passages "tribute" is meant, as RV; 32 23; Ps 45 12. A few other words occur singly, e.g. 'eshkar, "a reward" (Ps 72 10); mas'ēth, "lifting up" (Est 2 18); nāthūn is tr^{d} "gifts" (Nu 8 19; RVm "Heb n^{e}thūnīm, given"); nēdheh, nādhān, "impure gifts" (Ezk 16 33); nissē'th, "a thing lifted up" (2 S 19 42); shōḥadh means "a bribe" (Ex 23 8; Dt 16 19; 2 Ch 19 7; Prov 6 35; 17 8.23; Isa 1 23; Ezk 22 12); in each instance ARV has "bribe" except Prov 6 35, "gifts"; t^{e}rūmāh, "a present" (Prov 29 4), may also mean a bribe, AV "he that receiveth gifts," RV "he that exacteth gifts," m "imposeth tribute, Heb a man of offerings."

In the NT dōron, "a present," "gift" (from dídōmi, "to give"), is tr^{d} "gift" (Mt 2 11; 5 23.24 bis; Mk 7 11 AV; He 5 1; Rev 11 10, etc, referring chiefly to gifts or offerings to God); dōrea, "a free gift" (Jn 4 10; Acts 2 38; Rom 5 15.17; 2 Cor 9 15; He 6 4, etc, referring to the gifts of God); dôrēma, "a free gift" (Rom 5 16; Jas 1 17, ERV "boon"); dósis, "a giving" (Jas 1 17, "every good gift," RVm "giving"); charisma, "grace," "favor," a benefit or good conferred, is also used of Divine gifts and favors, esp. of the supernatural gifts imparted by the Holy Spirit (charismata) enumerated in Rom 12; 1 Cor 12; the word occurs tr^{d} "gift, gifts" (Rom 1 11), "some spiritual gift" (5 15.16, "free gift"; 6 23, "The gift of God is eternal life," RV "free gift"; 11 29; 1 Cor 1 7; 7 7; 2 Cor 1 11; 1 Tim 4 14; 2 Tim 1 6; 1 Pet 4 10); cháris, "grace," "favor" (2 Cor 8 4, RV "grace"); merismós, "distribution," "parting" (He 2 4, RVm "distributions"); anáthēma, "a thing devoted to God," is once (Lk 21 5) used of "the goodly gifts" (RV "offerings") which adorned the Temple at Jerus.

In RV "gift" is substituted in the text of Gen 33 11 for blessing, m "Heb blessing"; "boasteth himself of his gifts falsely" (Prov 25 14) for "boasteth himself of a false gift," m "Heb in a gift of falsehood"; "a parting gift" for "presents" (Mic 1 14); "Given to God" for "a gift" (Mk 7 11).

GIHON, gī′hon (גִּיחוֹן, gīḥōn; Γηών, Gēôn): One of the four rivers of Eden (Gen 2 13). It is said to compass the whole land of Cush (Ethiopia), probably a province E. of the Tigris. The Gihon is thought by Sayce to be the Kerkha, coming down from Luristan through the province known in the cuneiform texts as Kassi, probably the Cush of the Bible. See Eden.

Used fig. of wisdom in Sir 24 27, "as Gihon [AV Geon] in the days of vintage."

GIHON (גִּיחוֹן, gīḥōn, גִּחוֹן, giḥōn [in 1 K], from root גִּיחַ, "to burst forth"):

(1) See preceding article.

(2) The Nile in Jer 2 18 LXX (Γηῶν, Gēôn); in Heb שִׁחוֹר, shiḥōr (see Shihor).

(3) A spring in Jerus, evidently sacred, and, for that reason, selected as the scene of Solomon's coronation (1 K 1 38). It is without doubt the spring known to the Moslems as 'Ain Umm ed deraj ("the spring of the steps") and to the Christians as 'Ain Sitti Miriam ("the spring of the lady Mary"), or commonly as the "Virgin's Fount." It is the one true spring of Jerus, the original source of attraction to the site of the early settlers; it is situated in the Kidron valley on the E. side of "Ophel," and due S. of the temple area. See Jerusalem. The water in the present day is brackish and impregnated with sewage. The spring is intermittent in character, "bursting up" at intervals: this feature may account for the name Gihon and for its sacred characters. In NT times it was, as it is today, credited with healing virtues. See Bethesda. Its position is clearly defined in the OT. Manasseh "built an outer wall to the city of David, on the W. side of Gihon, in the valley" (=Nahal, i.e. the Kidron; 2 Ch 33 14). From Gihon Hezekiah made his aqueduct (2 Ch 32 30), now the Siloam tunnel. See Siloam.

The Virgin's Fount.

The spring is approached by a steep descent down 30 steps, the water rising deep underground; the condition is due to the vast accumulation of rubbish—the result of the many destructions of the city—which now fills the valley bed. Originally the water ran down the open valley. The water rises from a long deep crack in the rock, partly under the lowest of the steps and to a lesser extent in the mouth of a small cave, 11½ ft. long by 5 ft. wide, into which all the water pours. The village women of Siloam obtain the water at the mouth of the cave, but when the supply is scanty they actually go under the lowest step—where there is a kind of chamber—and fill their vessels there. At the farther end of this cave is the opening leading into the aqueduct down which the water flows to emerge after many windings at the pool of Siloam. The first part of this aqueduct is older than the time of Hezekiah and led originally to the perpendicular shaft, connected with "Warren's tunnel" described elsewhere (see Siloam; Zion).

The preëminent position of importance which Gihon held in the eyes of the earlier inhabitants of Jerus is shown by the extraordinary number of passages, rock cuttings, walls and aqueducts which exist all about the spring. Walls have been made at different periods to bank up the waters and direct them into the channels provided for them. Of aqueducts, besides the "Siloam aqueduct," two others have been formed. One running from the source at a considerable lower level than that of Hezekiah was followed by the present writer (see PEFS, 1902, 35–38) for 176 ft. It was very winding, following apparently the W. side of the Kidron valley. It was a well-cemented channel, about 1½ ft. wide and on an average of 4½ ft. high, roofed in with well-cut stones. There are no certain indications of age, but in the writer's opinion it is a much later construction than Hezekiah's aqueduct, though the rock-cut part near the source may be older. It was discovered by the Siloam fellahin, because, through a fault in the dam, all the water of the "Virgin's Fount" was disappearing down this channel. A third aqueduct has recently been discovered running off at a higher level than the other two. It is a channel deeply cut in the rock with curious trough-like stones all along its floor. It appears to be made for water, but one branch of it actually slopes upward toward its end. The pottery, which is early Hebrew, shows that it is very ancient. The whole accumulated débris around the source is full of pre-Israelite and early Israelite pottery.

GILALAI, gil′a-lī, gi-lā′lī (גִּלֲלַי, gilălay): A musician in the procession at the dedication of the wall, son of a priest (Neh 12 36).

GILBOA, gil-bō′a, MOUNT (הַר הַגִּלְבֹּעַ, har ha-gilbō^{a}', "Mount of the Gilboa"): Unless we should read "Gilboa" for "Gilead" in Jgs 7 3 (see Gilead, 2) this mountain is mentioned in Scripture only in connection with the last conflict of Saul with the Philis, and his disastrous defeat (1 S 28 4; 31 1.8; 2 S 1 6.21; 21 12; 1 Ch 10 1.8). If Zer'īn be identical with Jezreel—a point upon which Professor R. A. S. Macalister has recently cast some doubt—Saul must have occupied the slopes on the N.W. side of the mountain, near "the fountain which is in Jezreel" (1 S 29 1). The Philis attacked from the plain, and the battle went sore against the men of Israel, who broke and fled; and in the flight Jonathan, Abinadab and Malchi-shua, sons of Saul, were slain. Rather than be taken by his lifelong foes, Saul fell upon his sword and died (1 S 31 1 ff).

The modern name of the mountain is Jebel Faḳu'a. It rises on the eastern edge of the plain of Esdraelon, and, running from Zer'īn to the S.E., it then sweeps southward to join the Samarian uplands. It presents an imposing appearance from the plain, but the highest point, Sheikh Burḳān, is not more than 1,696 ft. above sea level. In the higher reaches the range is rugged and barren; but vegetation is plentiful on the lower slopes, esp. to the W. The Kishon takes its rise on the mountain. Under the northern cliffs rises 'Ain Jalūd, possibly identical with Harod, Well of, which see. In Jelbūn, a village on the western declivity, there is perhaps an echo of the old name.

GILEAD, gil′ē-ad (הַגִּלְעָד, ha-gil'ādh, "the Gilead"): The name is explained in Gen 31 46 ff.51, as derived from Heb gal, "a cairn," and 'ēdh, "witness," agreeing in meaning with the Aram. y^{e}gharsāhădhūthā'. The Arab. jil^{e}ād means "rough," "rugged."

(1) A city named in Hos 6 8; 12 11, possibly to be identified with Gilead near to Mizpah (Jgs 10 17). If this is correct, the ancient city may be represented by the modern Jil'ād, a ruin about 5 miles N. of es-Salṭ.

(2) A mountain named in Jgs 7 3. Gideon, ordered to reduce the number of men who were with him, commanded all who were "fearful and trembling" to "return and depart from Mt. Gilead." RVm reads "return and go round about from Mt. Gilead." Gideon and his army lay to the S. of the plain of Jezreel on the lower slopes of Gilboa. It has been suggested (Studer, Comm., ad loc.) that, as the Midianites lay between the men of the northern tribes and their homes, they were told to cross the Jordan, make a détour through Gilead, and thus avoid the enemy. Possibly, however, we should read Gilboa for Gilead; or part of the mountain may have borne the name of Gilead. The last suggestion is favored by the presence of a strong spring under the northern declivity of Gilboa, nearly 2 miles from Zer'īn, possibly to be identified with the Well of Harod. In the modern name, 'Ain Jalūd, there may be an echo of the ancient Gilead.

1. The Land of Gilead

(3) The name is applied generally to the mountain mass lying between the Yarmūk on the N., and Wādy Hesbān on the S.; the Jordan being the boundary on the W., while on the E. it marched with the desert. Mount Gilead—lit. "Mount of the Gilead"—may refer to some particular height which we have now no means of identifying (Gen 31 23). The name Jebel Jilʻād is still, indeed, applied to a mountain S. of Nahr ez-Zerḳā and N. of es-Salṭ; but this does not meet the necessities of the passage as it stands. The same expression in Dt 3 12 obviously stands for the whole country. This is probably true also in Cant 4 1. The name Gilead is sometimes used to denote the whole country E. of the Jordan (Gen 37 25; Josh 22 9; 2 S 2 9, etc). 2. Bashan Again, along with Bashan, it indicates the land E. of Jordan, as distinguished from the Moab plateau (Dt 3 10; Josh 13 11; 2 K 10 33). In the N. Gilead bordered upon Geshur and Maacah (Josh 13 11.13); and here the natural boundary would be formed by the deep gorge of the Yarmūk and Wādy esh-Shellāleh. In pre-Israelite times the Jabbok (Nahr ez-Zerḳā), which cuts the country in two, divided the kingdom of Sihon from that of Og (Dt 3 16; Josh 12 2). The frontiers between the tribes of Reuben, Gad and Manasseh cannot be indicated with any certainty. Probably they varied at different times (cf Josh 13 24 ff; 1 Ch 5 8.9.11.16). It greatly increases the difficulty that so many of the cities named are still unidentified. But in any case it is clear that the bulk of Gilead fell to Gad, so that Gilead might stand for Gad (Jgs 5 17). Havvoth-jair (which see), "the villages of Jair," lay in Gilead (Jgs 10 4). The modern division of the country follows the natural features. From the Yarmūk to Nahr ez-Zerḳā is the district of ʻAjlūn; and from the Zerḳā to the Arnon is el-Belḳā.

3. Geology

The geological formation is the same as that of Western Pal, but the underlying sandstone, which does not appear W. of the Jordan, forms the base slopes of the chain of Moab and Gilead, and is traceable as far as the Jabbok. It is covered in part by the more recent white marls which form the curious peaks of the foothills immediately above the Jordan valley; but reaches above them to an elevation of 1,000 ft. above the Mediterranean on the S., and forms the bed of the Buḳeiʻa basin farther E., and 1,000 ft. higher. Above this lies the hard, impervious dolomite limestone which appears in the rugged hills round the Jabbok and in Jebel ʻAjlūn, rising on an average 1,500 ft. above the sandstone and forming the bed of the copious springs. It also dips toward the Jordan valley, and the water from the surface of the plateau, sinking down to the surface of their formation, bursts out of the hill slopes on the W. in perennial brooks. It was from the ruggedness of this hard limestone that Gilead obtained its name. Above this again is the white chalk of the desert plateau, the same as that found in Samaria and Lower Galilee, with bands of flint or chert in contorted layers, or strewn in pebbles on the surface. Where this formation is deep the country is bare and arid, supplied by cisterns and deep wells. Thus the plateau becomes desert, while the hill slopes abound in streams and springs; and for this reason Western Gilead is a fertile country, and Eastern Gilead is a wilderness (Conder, DB, s.v.).

4. Mountains

The uplands of Gilead may be described as the crumpling of the edge of the great eastern plateau ere it plunges into the Ghōr. The average height of the range is about 4,000 ft. above the Jordan valley, or 3,000 ft. above the Mediterranean. The greatest height is toward the S., where it culminates in Jebel Oshʻa (3,597 ft.), to the N. of es-Salṭ. This mountain commands a most spacious view. To the E. of it lies the hollow (an old lake bottom) of el-Buḳeiʻa, fully 1,500 ft. lower. In the N. we have Jebel Hakart (3,408 ft.), W. of Reimūn. Almost as high (3,430 ft.) is Jebel Kafkafah, about 12 miles to the N.E. A striking point (2,700 ft.) fully 2 miles N.W. of ʻAjlūn, is crowned by Ḳalʻat er-Rabad, whence again a view of extraordinary extent is gained.

5. Streams and Products

The Yarmūk and the Zerḳā—see Jabbok—are the main streams, but almost every valley has its perennial brook. While not so rich as the volcanic loam in the N. and in the S., the soil of Gilead amply repays the labor of the husbandman. Of flowers the most plentiful are the phlox, the cistus and the narcissus. Hawthorn, mastic and arbutus abound, while many a glen and slope is shady with shaggy oak woods, and, in the higher reaches, with pines. The streams are fringed with oleander. The monotony of the stony plateau is broken by clumps of the hardy white broom. In the lower ground are found the tamarisk and the lotus, with many a waving cane-brake. The scenery is more beautiful and picturesque than that of any other district of Pal. The soil is not now cultivated to any great extent; but it furnishes ample pasture for many flocks and herds (Cant 6 5).

The Ishmaelites from Gilead (Gen 37 25) were carrying "spicery and balm and myrrh." From old time Gilead was famed for its Balm (q.v.). The lōṭ, trd "myrrh" in the above passage, was probably the gum produced by the Cistus ladaniferus, a flower which still abounds in Gilead.

6. History

After the conquest, as we have seen, Gilead passed mainly into the hands of Gad. An Ammonite attack was repulsed by the prowess of Jephthah (Jgs 11 1 ff); and the spite of the Ephraimites was terribly punished (12 1 ff). Gilead at first favored the cause of Ishbosheth (2 S 2 9), but after the murder of that prince the Gileadites came with the rest of Israel to David (5 1). By the conquest of the fortress Rabbah, which the Ammonites had continued to hold, the land passed finally under the power of David (12 26 ff). David fled to Mahanaim from Absalom, and that rebel prince perished in one of the forests of Gilead (2 S 17 24; 18 6 ff). Joab's census included Gilead (24 6). Solomon had two commissariat districts in Gilead (1 K 4 13 f.19). Before Ramoth-gilead, which he sought to win back from the Syrians who had captured it, Ahab received his death wound (22 1 ff). The Syrians asserted their supremacy in Gilead (2 K 10 32 f) where Moab and Israel had contended with varying fortune (M S). At length Tiglath-pileser overran the country and transported many of the inhabitants (2 K 15 29). This seems to have led to a reconquest of the land by heathenism, and return to Gilead was promised to Israel (Zec 10 10).

At a later time the Jewish residents in Gilead were exposed to danger from their heathen neighbors. On their behalf Judas Maccabaeus invaded the country and met with striking success (1 Macc 5 9 ff). Alexander Jannaeus, who had subdued Gilead, was forced to yield it again to the king of Arabia (Ant, XIII, xiv, 2; BJ, I, iv, 3). During the Roman period, esp. in the 2d and 3d cents. AD, the land enjoyed great prosperity. Then were built such cities as Gadara and Gerasa, which are still imposing, even in ruins. The appearance of the Moslem armies was the signal for its decay. Attempts were made to recover it for Christianity by Baldwin I (1118 AD) and Baldwin II (1121 AD); and the Crusaders left their mark in such strongholds as Ḳal'at er-Rabad, and the castle at es-Salṭ. With the reassertion of Moslem supremacy a curtain falls over the history of the district; and only in comparatively recent times has it again become known to travelers. The surveys directed by the Pal Exploration Fund, in so far as they have been carried out, are invaluable. N. of the Jabbok are many villages, and a fair amount of cultivation. Es Salṭ is the only village of any importance in the S. It is famous for its raisins. Its spacious uplands, its wooded and well-watered valleys have been for centuries the pasture-land of the nomads.

GILEAD (גִּלְעָד, gil'ādh):

(1) A son of Machir, grandson of Manasseh (Nu 26 29.30).

(2) The father of Jephthah (Jgs 11 1.2).

(3) A Gadite, the son of Michael (1 Ch 5 14).

GILEAD, MOUNT. See Gilead (2).

GILEADITES, gil'ē-ad-īts:

(1) A branch of the tribe of Manasseh (Nu 26 29).

(2) Natives of the district of Gilead (Jgs 10 3; 11 1, etc).

GILGAL, gil'gal (גִּלְגָּל, gilgāl, "circle"; Γάλγαλα, Gálgala): The art. is always with the name except in Josh 5 9. There are three places to which the name is attached:

(1) The first camp of Israel after crossing the Jordan (Josh 4 19; 5 9.10; 9 6; 10 7; 14 6; 15 7; Dt 11 30). According to Josh 15 7 it lay to the N. of the valley of Achor, which formed the border between Judah and Benjamin. Here 12 memorial stones taken from the bed of the river were set up by Joshua, after the miraculous crossing of the Jordan; and here (Josh 5 5 ff) the people were circumcised preparatory to their possession of the land, when it is said in Josh, with a play upon the word, "This day have I rolled away the reproach of Egypt from off you." Whereupon the Passover was celebrated (ver 10) and the manna ceased (ver 12). To Gilgal the ark returned every day after having compassed the city of Jericho during its siege (6 11). Hither the Gibeonites came to make their treaty (9 3 ff), and again (10 6) to ask aid against the Amorites. Gilgal was still the headquarters of the Israelites after the battle with the Amorites (ver 15); again after Joshua's extensive victorious campaign in the hill country of Judaea extending to Kadesh-barnea and Gaza (10 15 ff); and still later upon his return from the great battle at the Waters of Merom (14 6). At the conclusion of the conquest (18 1), the headquarters were transferred to Shiloh on the summit of the mountain ridge to the W.

Gilgal reappears frequently in subsequent history. Samuel (1 S 7 16) made it one of the three places where he annually held circuit court, the other places being Bethel and Mizpah. The LXX text adds that these were holy places. The place continued as one of special resort for sacrifices (10 8; 13 8.9.10; 15 21), while it was here that Samuel hewed Agag to pieces before the Lord (15 33), and that Saul was both crowned (11 14.15) and rejected as king. It was at Gilgal, also (2 S 19 15), that the people assembled to welcome David as he returned from his exile beyond Jordan during Absalom's rebellion. The early prophets refer to Gilgal as a center of idolatry in their day (Hos 4 15; 9 15; 12 11; Am 4 4; 5 5). Micah (6 5) represents Gilgal as at the other end of the Dead Sea from Shittim.

In 1874 Conder recognized the name Gilgal as surviving in Birket Jiljûlieh, a pool beside a tamarisk tree 3 miles E. of old Jericho. The pool measures 100 ft. by 84, and is surrounded with a wall of roughly hewn stones. N. of the pool Bliss discovered lines of masonry 300 yds. long, representing probably the foundations of an ancient monastery. S. of the pool there are numerous mounds scattered over an area of one-third of a sq. mile, the largest being 50 ft. in diameter, and 10 in height. On excavation some pottery and glass were found. These ruins are probably those of early Christian occupation, and according to Conder there is nothing against their marking the original site. Up to the Middle Ages the 12 stones of Joshua were referred to by tradition.

(2) According to 2 K 2 1; 4 38, Elisha for a time made his headquarters at Gilgal, a place in the mountains not far from Bethel identified by Conder as Jiljilia, standing on a high hill on the N. side of the Wādy el-Jib. It is lower than Bethel, but the phrase in 2 K 2 2, "they went down to Beth-el," may refer to their initial descent into the wādy. It could not have been said that they went down from Gilgal to Bethel in the Jordan valley. The place seems to be referred to in Neh 12 29 as Beth-gilgal.

(3) Gilgal of the nations: In Josh 12 23 Gilgal is mentioned as a royal city associated with Dor, evidently upon the maritime plain. Dor is identified with Tantura, while Conder identifies this Gilgal with Jiljúlieh, 30 miles S. of Dor and 4 miles N. of Anti-patris.

GILOH, gī'lō (גִּלֹה, gilōh): A town in the hill country of Judah mentioned along with Jattir, Socoh, Debir, Eshtemoa, etc (Josh 15 51). Ahithophel came from here (2 S 15 12) and is called the Gilonite (2 S 23 34). Driver infers from this last that the original form was Gilon, not Giloh. Probably the ruins Kh. Jālā, in the hills 3 miles N.W. of Hulhūl, mark the site (PEF, III, 313, Sh XXI).

GILONITE, gī'lō-nīt. See preceding article.

GIMEL, gē'mel, gim'el (גּ, ג): The 3d letter of the Heb alphabet, and used as such to designate the 3d part of Ps 119; transliterated in this Encyclopaedia with the dagesh as g, and without as gh (aspirated g). It came also to be used for the number three (3), and with the dieresis for 3,000. For name, etc, see Alphabet.

GIMZO, gim'zō (גִּמְזוֹ, gimzō; Γαμζῶ, Gamzô): A town of Judah on the border of the Phili plain, captured by the Philis in the days of Ahaz (2 Ch 28 18). It is the modern Jimzu, a small mud village about 3½ miles S.E. of Ludd (Lydda), on the old mule road from there to Jerus (Robinson, BR, II, 248–49; SWP, II, 297).

GIN, jin (מוֹקֵשׁ, mōḳēsh, פַּח, paḥ): A noose of hair or wire for snaring wild birds alive. There are over half a dozen traps and net devices indicated by different terms in the Bible. The gin was of horse-hair for small birds and wire for larger ones. It is mentioned in Am 3 5: "Can a bird fall in a snare upon the earth, where no gin is set for him? shall a snare spring up from the ground, and have taken nothing at all?" Job writing in mental and physical discomfort on the ash heap included all methods mentioned in one outburst:

> "For he is cast into a net by his own feet,
> And he walketh upon the toils.
> A gin shall take him by the heel,
> And a snare shall lay hold on him,
> A noose is hid for him in the ground,
> And a trap for him in the way" (Job 18 8 ff).

GENE STRATTON-PORTER

GINATH, gī′nath (גִּינַת, gīnath): Father of Tibni, the unsuccessful rival of Omri (1 K 16 21. 22).

GINNETHOI, gin-ĕ-thō′ī (AV Ginnetho), GINNETHON, gin′ĕ-thon (גִּנְּתוֹי, ginnᵉthōy, and גִּנְּתוֹן, ginnᵉthōn): The head of a priestly family. Ginnethoi (Ginnetho) is found in Neh 12 4, and Ginnethon in 10 6; 12 16.

GIRDLE, gûr′d'l. See ARMOR; DRESS.

GIRGASHITE, gûr′ga-shīt (גִּרְגָּשִׁי, girgāshī; Γεργεσαῖος, Gergesaíos; also punctuated [?] Girgasite [Gen 10 16 AV]): A son of (the land of) Canaan (Gen 10 16), and accordingly enumerated along with the Canaanite in the list of tribes or nationalities inhabiting that country (Gen 15 21; Dt 7 1; Josh 3 10; 24 11; Neh 9 8). It has been supposed that the name survived in that of "the Gergesenes," AV (RV "the Gadarenes"), of Mt 8 28, on the E. side of the Sea of Galilee; Jos (Ant, I, vi, 2), however, states that nothing was known about it. The inscriptions of the Egyp king, Ramses II, mention the Qarqish who sent help to the Hittites in their war with Egypt; but Qarqish was more probably in Asia Minor than in Syria. Pinches (The OT in the Light of the Historical Records, 324) would identify the Girgashites with the Kirkishati of an Assyr tablet; the latter people, however, seem to have lived to the E. of the Tigris, and it may be that, as in the case of the Hittites, a colony of the Qarqish, from Asia Minor, was established in Pal. A. H. SAYCE

GIRL, gûrl: Twice in the OT as the rendering of יַלְדָּה, yaldāh (Joel 3 3; Zec 8 5), in both cases in association with boys. Same word rendered "damsel" in Gen 34 4. See DAUGHTER; MAID, MAIDEN.

GIRZITES, gûr′zīts. See GIZRITES.

GISHPA, gish′pa (AV Gišpa; גִּשְׁפָּא, gishpā'): An officer of the Nethinim (Neh 11 21). A comparison with Ezr 2 43 makes it probable that he is to be identified with Hasupha, and quite possible that this word is a corruption of Hasupha.

GITTAH-HEPHER, git-ä-hē′fẽr (גִּתָּה חֵפֶר, gittāh ḥēpher): AV (Josh 19 13) for Gath-hepher. Gittah is correctly Gath with hē (ה) locale, meaning "toward Gath."

GITTAIM, git′ā-im (גִּתַּיִם, gittayim): The town to which the Beerothites fled, and where they lived as gērīm, or protected strangers (2 S 4 3). The place need not have been beyond the boundaries of Benjamin, so it may be identical with Gittaim of Neh 11 33, which was occupied by Benjamites after the exile. It is named with Hazor and Ramah; but so far the site has not been discovered.

GITTITES, git′īts (גִּתִּים, גִּתִּי, gittīm, pl. of gittī): The inhabitants of Gath. They are mentioned along with the inhabitants of the other chief Phili cities in Josh 13 3. It would seem that numbers of them emigrated to Judah, for we find 600 of them acting as a bodyguard to David with Ittai at their head (2 S 15 18 ff; 18 2). Obed-edom, to whom David intrusted the ark when he was frustrated in bringing it into the city of David, was a Gittite (2 S 6 11 f; 1 Ch 13 13). The Gittites seem to have been remarkable for their great stature (2 S 21 19; 1 Ch 20 5 ff).

GITTITH, git′ith. See MUSIC; PSALMS.

GIVE (נָתַן, nāthan, יָהַב, yāhabh, שׂוּם, sūm; δίδωμι, dídōmi): "Give" is a very common word in the OT. It is most frequently the tr of nāthan, "to give" (Gen 1 29; 3 6; Ex 2 9; Dt 1 8.20, etc, over 800 instances); nāthan is also tr^{d} "to give up" (Dt 23 14; Isa 43 6; Hos 11 8); of yāhabh, "to give" (Gen 30 1; 1 Ch 16 28 AV). In Ps 55 22 we have the perfect with suffix, "Cast thy burden upon Jeh," m "what he hath given thee"; elsewhere it is the imperative "Give!" (AV in Gen, "Go to"); sūm, "to put," "place" (Nu 6 26; Prov 8 29); rūm, "to lift up," "exalt" (2 Ch 30 24 bis; 35 7.8.9, "to give to"); shūbh, "to cause to turn back" (Lev 25 51.52; 2 K 17 3, "to give again"); various other words are in single instances tr^{d} "give."

In the NT, the common word is didōmi, "to give" (Mt 4 9; Jn 1 12; Rev 1 1; 21 6, etc); we have also apodídōmi, "to give away [from one's self]" (Mt 12 36; Lk 16 2; Acts 4 33; 19 40; Rev 22 12); diadídōmi, "to give throughout" (Rev 17 13); epidídōmi, "to give upon or besides" (Mt 7 9.10; Jn 13 26); metadídōmi, "to give a share" (Rom 12 8); paradídōmi, "to give over to" (Rom 1 28; 1 Cor 13 3; Gal 2 20, etc); prodídōmi, "to give forth or foremost" (Rom 11 35); aponémō, "to apportion" (1 Pet 3 7); dōréomai, "to give as a gift" (Mk 15 45, RV "granted"; 2 Pet 1 3.4 AV); marturéō, "to give testimony or witness" (1 Jn 5 10); pareisphérō, "to bring forward therewith" (2 Pet 1 5); paréchō, "to hold near by" (Col 4 1; 1 Tim 6 17); kataphérō, "to bear against or down" (Acts 26 10); charízomai, "to grant as a favor" (Lk 7 21; Acts 27 24; Rom 8 32; Gal 3 18; Phil 2 9; Philem ver 22 AV). A few other words mostly occurring singly are tr^{d} "give."

Of the many changes in RV, the following are among the most important: for "Thou hast also given me the necks of mine enemies," "Thou hast also made mine enemies turn their backs unto me" (2 S 22 41; Ps 18 40); for "He that made him can make his sword to approach unto him" (Job 40 19), ARV has "He only that made him giveth him his sword," ERVm "furnished"; for "hasten after another god" (Ps 16 4), ARV has "give gifts for" (ERVm); for "give" (Ps 29 1.2, etc), ARV has "ascribe"; for "give myself unto wine" (Eccl 2 3), "cheer my flesh with wine"; for "giveth his life" (Jn 10 11), "layeth down"; "given" is supplied (Acts 19 2), where we read instead of "We have not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost," "We did not so much as hear whether the Holy Spirit was given," m "there is a Holy Spirit"; for "Christ shall give thee light" (Eph 5 14), "Christ shall shine upon thee"; for "give in charge" (1 Tim 5 7), "command"; for "not given to wine" (1 Tim 3 3; Tit 1 7), "no brawler," m "not quarrelsome over wine"; for "she that liveth in pleasure" (1 Tim 5 6), "giveth herself to"; for "All scripture is given by inspiration of God" (2 Tim 3 16), "Every scripture inspired of God," m "Every scripture is inspired of God"; for "given to filthy lucre" (Tit 1 7), "greedy of"; in He 2 16, ARV has "For verily not to angels doth he give help," m "For verily not of angels doth he take hold, but he taketh hold," etc (cf Isa 41 9; Ecclus 4 11; 8 9 [in the Gr] ERV, "not of angels doth he take hold") (the idea is that of taking hold of to lift up or help); in 13 15 for "giving thanks to his name," RV reads "make confession to his name"; for "giving all diligence" (2 Pet 1 5), "adding."

The prominence of "give" in the Bible reminds us that God is the great Giver (Jas 1 5), and of the words of the Lord Jesus, "It is more blessed to give than to receive" (Acts 20 35), "Freely ye received, freely give" (Mt 10 8). W. L. Walker

GIZONITE, gī′zon-īt: This gentilic name in 1 Ch 11 34, "Hashem the Gizonite," is probably an error for "Gunite" (cf Nu 26 48), and the passage should be corrected, after 2 S 23 32, into "Jashen the Gunite."

GIZRITES, giz′rīts (גִּזְרִי, gizrī [Kᵉthībh]; AV Gezrites): Inhabitants of Gezer (q.v.). Ḳᵉrē reads גִּרְזִי, girzī, Girzites (1 S 27 8).

GLAD TIDINGS, tī′dingz (εὐαγγελίζω, euaggelizō): "Glad-tidings" occurs in AV in the tr of the vb. euaggelizō, "to tell good news" (Lk 1 19; 8 1; Acts 13 32; Rom 10 15); in each instance, except the last, RV trs "good tidings." The vb. is also very frequently trd in AV "to preach the gospel," the original meaning of which word (god-spell) is "good news or tidings" (Mt 11 5; Lk 4 18; 7 22; 9 6; 20 1); in the first two passages RV substitutes "good tidings," m "the gospel"; in the last two instances "the gospel" is retained, ARVm "good tidings"—the gospel or good tidings being the announcement of the near approach of the promised, long-looked-for salvation and kingdom of God; in Rom 1 15; 15 20; 1 Cor 1 17, etc, AV has "the gospel," viz. that of God's reconciliation of the world to Himself in Christ; RV in some passages substitutes "good tidings," or gives this in the margin; but "glad tidings" stands only in Rom 10 15. GLASS, glas (זְכוּכִית, zᵉkhūkhīth; ὕαλος, húalos): Glass is of great antiquity. The story of its discovery by accident, as related by Pliny (NH, xxxvi.65), is apocryphal, but it was natural for the Greeks and Romans to ascribe it to the Phoenicians, since they were the producers of the article as known to them.

1. History

The Egyp monuments have revealed to us the manufacture in a time so remote that it must have preceded that of the Phoenicians. A representation of glass-blowing on monuments of the Old Empire, as formerly supposed, is now regarded as doubtful, but undoubted examples of glazed pottery of that age exist. A fragment of blue glass has been found inscribed with the name of Antef III, of the XIth Dynasty, dating from 2000 or more BC (Davis, Ancient Egypt, 324). The oldest dated bottle, or vase, is one bearing the name of Thothmes III, 1500 or more BC, and numerous examples occur of later date. The close connection between Egypt and Syria from the time of Thothmes on must have made glass known in the latter country, and the Phoenicians, so apt in all lines of trade and manufacture, naturally seized on glass-making as a most profitable art and they became very proficient in it. The earliest glass was not very transparent, since they did not know how to free the materials used from impurities. It had a greenish or purplish tinge, and a large part of the examples we have of Phoen glass exhibit this. But we have many examples of blue, red and yellow varieties which were purposely colored, and others quite opaque and of a whitish color, resembling porcelain (Perrot and Chipiez, Art in Ancient Phoenicia and Its Dependencies). But both they and the Egyptians made excellent transparent glass also, and decorated it with brilliant coloring on the surface (ib; Beni Hasan, Archeol. Survey of Egypt, Pt IV). Layard (Nineveh and Babylon) mentions a vase of transparent glass bearing the name of Sargon (522–505 BC), and glass was early known to the Babylonians.

2. Manufacture

Phoenicia was the great center, and the quantities found in tombs of Syria and Pal go to confirm the statement that this was one of the great industries of this people, to which ancient authors testify (Strabo, Geog.; Pliny, NH). Jos refers to the sand of the Belus as that from which glass was made (BJ, II, x, 2). It seems to have been esp. adapted for the purpose, but there are other places on the coast where plenty of suitable sand could be obtained. The potash required was obtained by burning certain marine and other plants, and saltpetre, or nitre, was also employed. The manufacture began centuries BC on this coast, and in the 12th cent. AD a factory is mentioned as still being worked at Tyre, and the manufacture was later carried on at Hebron, even down to recent times (Perrot and Chipiez).

Both the Egyptians and Phoenicians gained such proficiency in making transparent and colored glass that they imitated precious stones with such skill as to deceive the unwary. Necklaces are found composed of a mixture of real brilliants and glass imitations. Cut glass was manufactured in Egypt as early as the XVIIIth Dynasty, and diamonds were made use of in the art. Glass composed of different colors in the same piece was made by placing layers of glass wire, of different colors, one above the other and then fusing them so that they became united in a solid mass without intermingling. Colored designs on the surface were produced by tracing the patterns, while the glass was still warm and plastic, deep enough to receive the threads of colored glass which were imbedded in them. The whole was heated again sufficiently to fuse the threads and attach them to the body. The surface was then made even by polishing. By this process vessels and ornaments of very beautiful design were produced. Many of the specimens, as found, are covered by an exquisite iridescence which is due wholly to the decomposition of the surface by chemical action, from lying buried for centuries in the soil which thus acts upon it. This is often lost in handling by the scaling off of the outer surface.

Glass, in the strict sense, is rarely mentioned in Scripture, but it was certainly known to the Hebrews, and occurs in Job 28 17 (trd "crystal" in AV). Bottles, cups and other vessels in glass must have been in use to some extent. The wine cup of Prov 23 31 and the bottle for tears mentioned in Ps 56 8 were most likely of glass. Tear bottles are found in great quantities in the tombs throughout the land and were undoubtedly connected with funeral rites, the mourners collecting their tears and placing them in these bottles to be buried with the dead. As mourners were hired for the purpose, the number of these bottles would indicate the extent to which the deceased was honored. These were, of course, small, some quite diminutive (see illustration), as also were the vials or pots to contain the ointment for the eyebrows and eyelashes, used to heighten the beauty of the women, which was probably a custom among the Hebrews as well as their neighbors. Rings, bracelets and anklets of glass are very common and were doubtless worn by the Heb women (see Isa 3 18 f). In the NT the Gr hualos occurs in Rev 21 18.21, and the adj. derived from it (huálinos) in 4 6 and 15 2. In the other passages, where in AV "glass" occurs, the reference is to "looking-glass," or mirror, which was not made of glass, but of bronze, and polished so as to reflect the light similar to glass. The Heb word for this is גִּלָּיוֹן, gillāyōn (Isa 3 23), or מַרְאָה, mar'āh (Ex 38 8), and the Gr ἔσοπτρον, ésoptron (1 Cor 13 12; Jas 1 23; cf Wisd 7 26; Sir 12 11).

The composition of the Phoen glass varies considerably. The analysis shows that, besides the ordinary constituents of silica, lime, lead, potash or soda, other elements are found, some being used for the purpose of coloring, such as manganese to give the purplish or violet hue, cobalt for blue, copper for red, etc. The articles illustrated above are of ordinary transparent glass with an iridescent surface, caused by decomposition, as mentioned above, indicated by the scaly appearance. Nos. 1, 4 and 5 are tear bottles, no. 4 being only $1\frac{3}{4}$ in. in height; nos. 2 and 3 are ointment vases which were used for the ointment with which ladies were accustomed to color their eyebrows and eyelashes to enhance their beauty. This custom still prevails in the East. The small ladle by the side of the larger vase is of bronze, used in applying the ointment. This vase is double and $6\frac{3}{4}$ in. high, ornamented with glass wire wound upon it while plastic. The larger vases (nos. 6 and 7) are about 6 in. in height. The hand-mirror ("looking-glass" AV) is bronze, and had originally a polished surface, but is now corroded.

GLASS, SEA OF (θάλασσα ὑαλίνη, thálassa hualínē; Rev 4 6; 15 2): In the vision of heaven in these two apocalyptic passages a "glassy sea" is seen before the throne of God. The pure translucency of the sea is indicated in the former reference by the words, "like unto crystal"; and the fiery element that may symbolize the energy of the Divine holiness is suggested in the latter passage by the trait, "mingled with fire." On the margin of this sea—on the inner side—stood the victorious saints, with harps, singing the song of Moses and of the Lamb (15 2–4). The imagery here points to a relation with the triumphal song in Ex 15, after the deliverance from Pharaoh at the Red Sea. It is not easy to define the symbolism precisely. The sea, reflecting in its crystalline depths the purity and holiness of the Divine character and administration, speaks at the same time of difficulties surmounted, victory obtained and safety assured, the after-glow of the Divine judgments by which this result has been secured still illuminating the glassy expanse that has been crossed. JAMES ORR

GLEANING, glēn'ing (לָקַט, lāḳaṭ, עָלַל, 'ālal): The custom of allowing the poor to follow the reapers in the field and glean the fallen spears of grain is strikingly illustrated in the story of Ruth (Ruth 2 2–23). This custom had back of it one of the early agricultural laws of the Hebrews (Lev 19 9; 23 22; Dt 24 19–21). Breaking this law was a punishable offence. The generosity of the master of the crop determined the value of the gleanings, as the story of Ruth well illustrates (Ruth 2 16). A reaper could easily impose upon the master by leaving too much for the gleaners, who might be his own children. The old Levitical law no longer holds in the land, but the custom of allowing the poor to glean in the grain fields and vineyards is still practised by generous landlords in Syria. The writer has seen the reapers, even when they exercised considerable care, drop from their hands frequent spears of wheat. When the reapers have been hirelings they have carelessly left bunches of wheat standing behind rocks or near the boundary walls. The owner usually sends one of his boy or girl helpers to glean these. If he is of a generous disposition, he allows some needy woman to follow after the reapers and benefit by their carelessness. It is the custom in some districts, after the main crop of grapes has been gathered, to remove the watchman and allow free access to the vineyards for gleaning the last grapes.

Gideon touched the local pride of the men of Ephraim when he declared that the glory of their conquest surpassed his, as the gleanings of their vineyards did the whole crop of Abiezer (Jgs 8 2). Gleaned is used of a captured enemy in Jgs 20 45.

Figurative: Israel, because of her wickedness, will be utterly destroyed, even to a thorough gleaning and destruction of those who first escape (Jer 6 9). The same picture of complete annihilation is given in Jer 49 9.10. JAMES A. PATCH

GLEDE, glēd (רָאָה, rā'āh; γύψ, gúps): A member of the hawk species. It is given among the list of abominations in Dt 14 13, but not in the Lev list (Lev 11 14). The kite is substituted. The Arabs might have called one of the buzzards the glede. In England, where specimens of most of these birds appear in migration, the glede is synonymous with kite, and was given the name from glide, to emphasize a gliding motion in flight. See illustration, p. 1235.

GLISTERING, glis'tẽr-ing (פּוּךְ, pūkh, "dye" [spec. "stibium"], "fair colors"; στίλβοντα, stílbonta): "'Glistering stones' (1 Ch 29 2) is better than the 'inlaid' of RV; for some kind of colored, brilliant stone seems meant" (HDB, II, 182); cf Isa 54 11 RVm. The term is employed in Mk 9 3 to denote the white, lustrous appearance of Christ's garments at the transfiguration. It occurs nowhere else in the NT. For once the Divine effulgence shone through the veil of the humiliation (cf Jn 1 14).

Glede (Buteo ferox).

GLITTER, glit´ẽr, GLITTERING, glit´ẽr-ing (בָּרָק, bārāḳ, "lightning"): The word is used in sense of "glittering" in the OT with "sword," "spear" (Dt 32 41; Job 20 25; Ezk 21 10.28; Nah 3 3; Hab 3 11). In Ezk 21 10 RV changes "glitter" to "as lightning," and in Dt 32 41 RVm gives, "the lightning of my sword." In Job 39 23, where the word is different (lahabh), RV has "flashing."

GLORIFY, glō´ri-fī: The Eng. word is the equivalent of a number of Heb and Gr words whose essential significance is discussed more fully under the word Glory (q.v.). The word "glorious" in the phrases "make or render glorious" is used most frequently as a tr of vbs. in the original, rather than of genuine adjs. In dealing with the vb. it will be sufficient to indicate the following most important uses.

(1) Men may glorify God, that is, give to Him the worship and reverence which are His due (Isa 24 15; 25 3; Ps 22 23; Dnl 5 23; Sir 43 30; Mt 5 16, and generally in the Synoptic Gospels and in some other passages of the NT).

(2) God, Yahweh (Jehovah), glorifies His people, His house, and in the NT, His Son, manifesting His approval of them and His interest in them, by His interposition on their behalf (Isa 55 5; Jer 30 19; Wisd 18 8; Sir 45 3; Jn 7 39, and often in the Fourth Gospel).

(3) By a usage which is practically confined to the OT, Jeh glorifies Himself, that is, secures the recognition of His honor and majesty, by His direction of the course of history, or by His interposition in history, either the history of His own people or of the world at large (Lev 10 3; Isa 26 15; Ezk 28 22; Hag 1 8). Walter R. Betteridge

GLORIOUS, glō´ri-us: The adj. "glorious" is used in the majority of cases as the tr of one of the nouns which are fully discussed in the article Glory, and the general meaning is the same, for the glorious objects or persons have the quality which is described by the word "glory," that is, they are honorable, dignified, powerful, distinguished, splendid, beautiful or radiant. It is worthy of note that in many passages in the NT where AV has "glorious," RV has the noun "glory." So among others in Rom 8 21, AV has "glorious liberty," RV "liberty of the glory of the sons of God." The obsolete use of the word glorious in the sense of "boastful," "vain-glorious," "eager for glory," as it is used in Wycliffe, Tindale and Bacon, and once or twice in Shakespeare, as in Cymbeline, I, 7, in the first speech of Imogen, "Most miserable is the desire that's glorious," and in Gower's Prologue to Pericles, 1.9, "The purchase of it is to make men glorious" occurs at least once in the apocryphal books, Ad Est 16 4 AV, "but also lifted up with the glorious words of lewd persons." I. Method of Treatment.—In this art. we deal, first, with a group of words, trd "glory" in the EV, and in which the ideas of size, rarity, beauty and adornment are prominent, the emphasis being laid in the first instance in each case upon some external physical characteristic which attracts the attention, and makes the object described by the word significant or prominent.

These are 'addereth (אַדֶּרֶת), perhaps to be connected with the Assyr root 'adaru, meaning "wide," "great"; hādhar, hădhārāh (הָדָר, הֲדָרָה), perhaps with root-meaning of "brightness"; hōdh (הוֹד), with essentially the same meaning of "brightness," "light"; ṭehār (טְהָר), Ps 89 44, trd "glory" in AV, in RV rendered "brightness"; yeḳārā' (יְקָרָא), an Aram. root meaning "rare"; tiph'ārāh (תִּפְאָרָה), with the root-meaning of "beauty"; and finally çebhī (צְבִי), perhaps on the basis of the Assyr ṣabu, meaning "desire," "desirable."

Secondly, this art. will discuss the most common and characteristic word for "glory" in the OT, the Heb kābhōdh (כָּבֹד) including the special phrase "the glory of God" or "the glory of Jeh." In dealing with the OT usage, attention will also be called to the original Heb of the Book of Ecclus or Wisdom of Jesus the Son of Sirach, cited in this art. as Sir. Thirdly, with the Gr word dóxa (δόξα) in the Apoc and in the NT. The nouns kaúchēma, kaúchēsis, trd "glory" or "glorying" in the NT, will be dealt with in the concluding paragraphs in which the use of the word glory as a vb. will briefly be discussed. It will be possible within the limits of this art. to give only the main outlines of the subject as illustrated by a few of the most significant references. The lexicons and the commentaries must be consulted for the details.

II. General Use of the Term.—In the first group, as has already been stated, the ideas of beauty, majesty and splendor are prominent. And these qualities are predicated first of all, of things. David determines to make the temple which Solomon is to build "a house of fame and of glory" (1 Ch 22 5). Then, and more commonly, glory belongs to men, and esp. to men of prominence, like kings. This glory may consist in wealth, power, position, or even in the inherent majesty and dignity of character of its possessor. The reference is most frequently, however, to the external manifestations. Physical power is suggested in Dt 33 17, where "glory" of AV is replaced by "majesty" in RV. The king's glory consists in the multitude of his people (Prov 14 28). The glory and the pomp of the rebellious people shall descend into Sheol (Isa 5 14). Here the reference is clearly to those external things upon which the people depend, and the possession of which is the ground of their confidence.

1. As Applied to External Things

2. As Applied to Jehovah

But chiefly glory is the possession and characteristic of Jeh, and is given by Him to His people or to anything which is connected with Him. In Isa 60 7 the Lord promises to glorify the house of His glory, and the meaning is clearly that He will impart to His house something of the beauty and majesty which belong to Him. Glory is one of the qualities which are distinctive of Jeh (1 Ch 29 11); and Isaiah, in one of his earliest utterances, uses the word "glory" to describe Jeh's self-manifestation in judgment to bring to naught the pride and power of men (Isa 2 10.19.21). The use of the word in Ps 78 61 is not quite certain. The most natural interpretation would perhaps be to refer it to the ark as the symbol of the presence of Jeh, but in view of the ‖ word "strength," it is perhaps better to interpret glory as meaning power, and to suppose that the Psalmist means that Jeh allowed His power to be temporarily obscured, and Himself to be seemingly humiliated on account of the sin of His people.

III. The Uses of Kābhōdh.—The use and significance of kābhōdh in the OT and in Sir: The fundamental idea of this root seems to be "weight," "heaviness," and hence in its primary uses it conveys the idea of some external, physical manifestation of dignity, preëminence or majesty. At least three uses may be distinguished: (1) It defines the wealth or other material possessions which give honor or distinction to a person; (2) the majesty, dignity, splendor or honor of a person; (3) most important of all, it describes the form in which Jehovah (Yahweh) reveals Himself, or is the sign and manifestation of His presence.

1. Material Wealth

In Gen 31 1 (m "wealth") it describes the flocks and herds which Jacob has acquired; in Ps 49 16 f, as the parallelism indicates, it refers to the wealth of the sinner; and in Isa 10 3 it is said that in the day of desolation the heartless plunderers of the poor shall not know where to leave their ill-gotten gain. This idea is also probably to be found in Hag 2 7, where the parallelism seems to indicate that the glory with which Jeh will fill the house is the treasure which He will bring into it. See also Sir 9 11, where the glory of the sinner which is not to be envied is probably his wealth.

2. Human Dignity and Majesty

It describes the majesty and dignity or honor of men due to their adornment or to their position. In Gen 45 13, Joseph bids his brethren tell their father of his glory in Egypt; according to Ex 28 40, the priestly garments are intended for the glorification of their wearers; in 1 S 4 21 f, the loss of the ark means, for Israel, the loss of her glory, that which gave her distinction from, and preëminence over, her neighbors; in Isa 22 23 it is said that Eliakim is to be a throne of glory, i.e. the source and manifestation of the splendor and dignity of his father's house; in Job 19 9 the complaint that God has stripped him of his glory must be taken to refer to his dignity and honor. Reference may also be made to the numerous passages in which the glory of Israel and other nations describes their dignity, majesty or distinction; so we hear of the glory of Ephraim (Hos 9 11), of Moab (Isa 16 14), of Kedar (Isa 21 16). This use is quite common in Sir. Sir 3 10 f states that the glory of man comes from the honor of his father; the possessor of wisdom shall inherit glory (4 13; 37 26); note also 4 21 with its reference to "a shame that is glory and grace," and 49 5 where the forfeited independence of Judah is described by the terms "power" and "glory."

3. "My Soul": the Self

Closely related to this use of kābhōdh to describe the majesty of men is the group of passages in which the phrase "my glory," in parallelism with nephesh (נֶפֶשׁ), "soul," "self," or some similar expression, means the man himself in his most characteristic nature. In the blessing of Jacob (Gen 49 6) we read, "Unto their assembly, my glory, be not thou united." Other passages are Ps 4 2; 7 5; 16 9; 30 12; 57 8; 108 1 and perhaps Job 29 20. Some recent interpreters, partly because of the LXX rendering in Gen 49 6 (tá hēpatá mou), "my liver," and partly because of the Assyr root, kabiṭṭu, meaning "temper" or "heart" (see Delitzsch, Assyrisches Handwörterbuch, 317*a*), would read in all these passages kābhēdh, lit. "liver," as in Lam 2 11, and interpret the figure as referring to the emotions as the expression of the self. The arguments in favor of the change are not without weight. Of course on either interpretation the language is highly figurative. It hardly seems necessary to change the reading, esp. as the LXX renders the passages in the Pss and in Job by doxa, the ordinary Gr rendering for kābhōdh, and it does not seem improbable that in poetry the word kābhōdh might be used to describe the man himself, indicating that man as such is honorable and glorious, possibly because as in Ps 8 1, he is thought of as having been crowned by his Creator with glory and honor.

Before leaving this use of kābhōdh it is necessary to call attention to the fact that in a few cases it is used to describe things, perhaps because these things are thought of as practically personified. The "glory of the forest" (Isa 10 18) is clearly a personification, referring to the majestic force of the Assyrians. We may probably assume a personification also in the case of the glory of Lebanon in Isa 35 2; 60 13, and the nature of the parable in Ezk 31 makes it probable that personification is intended in ver 18.

4. Self-manifestation of God (Jehovah)

But unquestionably the most important use of the word kābhōdh is its employment either with the following gen. God or Jeh, or absolutely, to describe the method or the circumstances of the self-manifestation of God. In discussing this subject we shall deal first of all with the use of the term as connected with actual or historical manifestations of the Deity, and then with its use to describe the characteristic features of the ideal state of the future, or, otherwise stated, the Messianic kingdom.

(1) Ex 23 18 ff.—The significance of the phrase in its earliest occurrence is by no means clear. Notwithstanding the uncertainty as to the exact documentary connection of the famous passage in Ex 33 18 ff, it seems quite certain that we may claim that this is the earliest historical reference that the OT contains to the glory of Jeh. "And he [Moses] said, Show me, I pray thee, thy glory. And he [Jeh] said Thou canst not see my face; . . . . and it shall come to pass, while my glory passeth by, that I will put thee in a cleft of the rock, and will cover thee with my hand until I have passed by: and I will take away my hand, and thou shalt see my back; but my face shall not be seen." The passage in its present form bears unmistakable evidences of the editorial hand, due perhaps, as Baentsch (Handkommentar zum AT, "Ex-Lev-Nu," 279) suggests, to a desire to transform the primitive, concrete, physical theophany into a revelation of the ethical glory of God, but in its basis it belongs to J and is therefore the earliest literary reference to the glory of God in the OT. The glory of Jeh is clearly a physical manifestation, a form with hands and rear parts, of which Moses is permitted to catch only a passing glimpse, but the implication is clear that he actually does see Jeh with his physical eyes.

It seems not improbable that in its original form it was related that Moses saw the glory, i.e., the form of Jeh, and thus that we are to find in this narrative the source for the statement in Nu 12 8, that he (Moses) will behold (or perhaps better rendering the tense as a frequentative), beholds the form of Jeh (see also the description in Ex 24 9–11). The mention of the cloud (Ex 34 5) as the accompaniment of the manifestation of Jeh suggests that the form of Jeh was thought of as being outlined in cloud and flame, and that Jeh was originally thought of as manifesting Himself in connection with meteorological or more probably volcanic phenomena.

(2) Isa 6.—Later the glory of Jeh and the form of Jeh are no longer identical terms, but the glory is still the physical manifestation of the Divine presence. This is clear from Isaiah's account of his great inaugural vision. The prophet sees the enthroned Jeh with His skirts filling the temple. There is no indication of what it was that he saw or how he recognized that it was Jeh. The attendant seraphim in addition to the solemn "Holy, Holy, Holy" declare that "the whole earth is full of his glory."

Unquestionably His glory is here regarded as something visible, something, a part of which at least, Isaiah sees. The glory as such has no ethical significance except in so far as it is the method of manifestation of one who is undoubtedly an ethical being. The phraseology suggests that the skirts which fill the temple and the glory which fills the whole earth refer to the phenomena of fire and smoke. Some think that the smoke is caused by the clouds of incense that would fill the temple in connection with the sacrificial observances. But in view of Isaiah's horror of these observances, this interpretation is very questionable. A more probable interpretation connects the clouds and gloom with the phenomena of a great storm, and even possibly of an earthquake, for it seems highly plausible that the call of Isaiah in the year of the death of King Uzziah coincided with the great earthquake in the days of Uzziah referred to in Zec 14 5. (It seems at least probable that the references to the darkness and light in Zec 14 6 f may have their origin in the phenomena attendant upon this earthquake. It is probable that the earthquake by which the prophecy of Amos is dated [Am 1 1] is also this same historic earthquake.) The clouds and fire attendant upon this storm or earthquake become the media by which the glory of Jeh is made known to the youthful prophet, and this glory partly reveals and partly conceals the presence of Jeh of which, through, and in part by means of, these phenomena, Isaiah is made so vividly conscious.

(3) Ps 19 1.—This conception of Isaiah that the glory of Jeh fills the earth is closely related to the thought of Ps 19 1 that "the heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament showeth his handiwork," the difference being that in the psalm Jeh's glory is manifested in the ordinary rather than in the extraordinary phenomena. Parallel thoughts may be found in Ps 8 1; 57 5; 108 5; 113 4. In Ps 29 1.2.3.9, as in Isaiah, the glory of Jeh is revealed in the extraordinary physical phenomena which the psalm describes. Glory here is a purely external, meteorological thing and is the manifestation of the presence of Jeh, no matter whether the psalm is regarded, as it usually is, as a description of a thunderstorm, or whether with von Gall and others it is taken as a description of the phenomena which accompany the inauguration of the Messianic kingdom (see Joel 2 30 f ERV).

(4) Sinai and the Temple.—Dt 5 24 indicates that in the theophany at the time of the giving of the law, the glory and the greatness of Jeh consisted in the fire and thick darkness which enveloped the mountain, and out of which Jeh spoke to the people. Essentially the same idea is expressed in the account of the dedication of Solomon's temple (1 K 8 10 f; 2 Ch 5 14). The cloud which filled the house of Jeh, preventing the priests from ministering, is identified with the glory of Jeh which filled the house. It is noteworthy that in 2 Ch 7 1–3 the glory of Jeh which fills the house manifests itself in the form of the cloud of smoke from the sacrifices which were consumed by the fire coming down from heaven.

(5) Ezekiel's visions.—Perhaps the most elaborate description of the glory of Jeh to be found in the OT is that given by Ezekiel in the various accounts of his visions. It is not easy to interpret his conception, but it seems clear that he does not identify the glory with the stormy clouds, the fire, the cherubim and the chariots. "The appearance of the likeness of the glory of Jeh" (Ezk 1 28) is not applied to all the phenomena which have been described in the preceding verses, but only to the likeness of form which looked like a man above the sapphire throne (ver 26). The same idea is indicated in 9 3 which states that "the glory of the God of Israel was gone up from the cherub, whereupon it was"; that is, the glory is something peculiar to Jeh, and is not quite identical with the phenomena which accompany it. This is true of all his visions. The glory of Jeh manifests itself with all the accompaniments which he describes with such richness of imagery, but the accompaniments are not the glory. For other descriptions of the glory of Jeh in Ezekiel, see 3 12.23; 8 4; 10 4.18 ff; 11 22 f.

Very similar to this conception of Ezekiel is that given in those passages of the Pent which are usually assigned to the PC. When the children of Israel murmured against Moses and Aaron on account of the lack of food, the glory of Jeh appeared in the cloud as they "looked toward the wilderness" (Ex 16 7.10; cf Ex 24 16 f). And just as in Ezk, the glory is distinguished from its attendant circumstances; for after the completion of the Tent of Meeting, the cloud covers the tent, and the glory of Jeh fills the tabernacle (Ex 40 34 f; see also Lev 9 6.23; Nu 14 21 f; 16 19.42; 20 6). The same thought is suggested in the references in Sir 17 13; 45 3.

(6) Messianic ideal.—These passages just cited stand on the border between the historical and the ideal descriptions of the glory of Jeh, for whatever may be one's views as to the historical worth of P's account of the Exodus and the wilderness sojourn, all must agree in seeing in it really the program or constitution for the ideal state of the future. And in this state the distinguishing characteristic is to be the manifest presence of Jeh in His sanctuary, and this manifestation is the glory. This is the view of Ezekiel, for whom the essential action in the establishment of the new community is the return of the glory of Jeh to the house of Jeh (Ezk 43 2.4.5; 44 4). The same thought is expressed very clearly in Isa 4 5 f, which may be rendered on the basis of a slight rearrangement and regrouping of the original, 'And Jeh will create over . . . . Mt. Zion

. . . . , a cloud and smoke by day, and the shining of a flaming fire by night; for over everything the glory [of Yahweh] shall be a canopy and a pavilion, and it shall serve as a shelter from the heat, and a refuge and a covert from the storm and the rain.' This tr has the advantage that it furnishes an intelligible and characteristic conclusion to the description of the Messianic age which the chapter contains. Isa 11 10, reading with RVm, "and his resting-place shall be glory," has the same thought, for it is clearly the glory of Jeh that is manifested in the resting-place of the root of Jesse, and this resting-place can be none other than Mt. Zion (cf also Isa 24 23).

The Pss and Deutero-Isa have many passages in which this phase of the thought is brought out. For both books the restoration of the people from captivity is to be accompanied by, or, perhaps better, itself is, a revelation of the glory of Jeh (Isa 40 5). The children of Israel have been created for the glory of Jeh, and hence they must be restored that His glory may be made manifest (43 7). The light of the restored community is to be the glory of Jeh (60 1 f). The presence of Jeh brings grace and glory (Ps 84 11), and His salvation of those that fear Him causes glory to dwell in the land (Ps 85 9). To these and many similar passages in Isa and the Pss may also be added Sir 36 14, which refers probably to the manifestation of God in glory in the Messianic kingdom.

(7) Its ethical content.—But these passages make it quite evident that "glory" is not always used in the external, lit. or fig. physical sense. It comes to have an ethical significance, and this because, like the holiness with which it is associated in Isa 6, it is connected with Jeh, who is more and more exclusively viewed as an ethical being. As holiness gradually loses its physical sense of aloofness, apartness, and comes to describe moral purity, so glory, because it is an attribute or expression of Jeh, comes to have a moral sense. This transformation, as we have seen, is already being made in the present text of Ex 33 18.20, and the connection with holiness in Isa 6 makes it almost certain that Isaiah gave the word an ethical connotation. So the God of glory of Ps 29 3 suggests a moral quality because Jeh is a moral being. All doubt on this matter disappears when we find the word "glory" used as the term for the essential nature of Jeh, as we have already found it to be used of man. In Isa 42 8, "I am Jeh, that is my name; and my glory will I not give to another," the meaning would seem to be, my essential character and power, that is, my glory, I will not share with other gods (cf also Isa 48 11). And in Isa 58 8 the glory must be taken in a figurative sense and refer to Jeh Himself in His saving grace, who attends His people in advance and in the rear. It hardly seems possible to deny the ethical sense in Ezk 39 21, where the manifestation of the glory of Jeh comes as a result of the execution of His purposes of justice and righteousness upon His people. And in Hab 2 14, the glory of Jeh which is to be known throughout the earth cannot be limited to any physical, external thing. It is equivalent to the righteous and just will of Jeh. These passages are sufficient to prove the ethical significance of the word kābhōdh, but it may be worth while to quote one more passage and this time from Ps 97 with its wonderful description of the blessings of the righteous rule of Jeh. It is stated in ver 6 that "the heavens declare his righteousness, and all the peoples have seen his glory." His righteousness may include, as Kirkpatrick suggests, "His faithfulness to His people and His sovereign justice in the punishment of all," or it may refer only to the former of these qualities; but in any case, it is a moral act, and by it the peoples recognize the glory of Jeh as the supreme moral ruler.

IV. In Apoc and NT.—"Glory" in the apocryphal books and in the NT is almost exclusively the tr of the Gr noun doxa. In all these writings the OT usage seems to be the most important, and it seems to be the fact, if one may judge from the LXX and from the original Heb of Sir, that the Gr noun doxa, in the great majority of cases, represents the Heb kābhōdh, so that the underlying thought is Heb, even though the words may be Gr.

1. In the Apoc

(1) As applied to external things.—It will be perhaps a little more convenient to deal with the usage of the Apoc separately, following essentially the order that has been adopted for the OT discussion of kābhōdh, and bearing in mind that the usage of Sir has been discussed under the OT. The use of the word "glory" to describe the honor, reputation and splendor which belong to men is quite common. In this sense 1 Esd 1 33 refers to the glory of Josiah, while in Wisd 10 14 the perpetual glory given by Wisd to Joseph must be interpreted in the same way. In 2 Macc 5 16.20 glory refers to the beautification and adornment of the temple in a sense like that of tiph'ārāh in Isa 60 7. In Jth 15 9 "glory" is the tr of the Gr gauríama, and indicates that Judith is the pride of Israel.

(2) As applied to God.—But the most significant use of doxa in the Apocrypha is that in which it refers to the light and splendor which are regarded as the invariable accompaniments of God. The reference may be to the historic manifestation of God in glory at Mt. Sinai, as in 2 Esd 3 19, or to the manifestation of God in Israel, which is to be the especial characteristic of the Messianic kingdom. In 1 Esd 5 61 songs sung to the praise of the Lord, "because his goodness and his glory are forever in all Israel," are based upon the hope that Jeh is about to establish the Messianic kingdom among the people who have bound themselves to obey His law. In several passages in 2 Esd the reference seems to be not to the Messianic kingdom in the historical sense, but rather to that kingdom of God which the saints are to inherit after death. This is clearly the thought in 2 Esd 2 36 and in 7 52; also in 8 51 where the context shows clearly that the reference is to the glory of Paradise, which is the heritage of all those who are like Ezra in their devotion to Jeh (cf also 10 50).

But most frequently in the Apoc, in a sense which approximates that of the NT, the word "glory" refers to the blaze of light and splendor which is the essential expression of the holy majesty of Jeh. The prayer of Manasseh refers to the unbearable majesty of the glory of Jeh; while 2 Esd 8 30, trusting in Jeh's glory is equivalent to trusting in Jeh Himself; and in 16 53 the oath "before God and his glory" is simply before the Lord God Himself. The same thought is expressed in Tob 12 15; 13 14; Wisd 7 25. In the Three, vs 31.33, the glory of Jeh refers to His self-manifestation in His heavenly kingdom, and this is undoubtedly the significance in the frequently recurring doxologies, "Thine is the glory forever."

2. In the NT

(1) As applied to men.—In the NT, much the same variety of usage is to be noted as in the OT and the Apoc, and it is not easy to trace the exact relationship and order of the various meanings. The ordinary classical use of the word in the sense of "opinion," "judgment," "view," occurs in Hellenistic Gr only in 4 Macc 5 17 (18) on the authority of Thayer.

It is perhaps as convenient to follow generally the order adopted in the preceding discussion. In some places the word refers to the manifestations and insignia of rank and power, as in the familiar phrase, "Solomon in all his glory" (Mt 6 29), or the glory of the kingdoms of the world (4 8), or the glory of the kings and nations of the earth which shall be brought into the heavenly city (Rev 21 24.26). Doxa also defines the praise, honor and dignity of men. This is the meaning in Jn 5 41.44, where Christ distinguishes between His accusers and Himself in that He receives not glory from men, while they receive glory one of another (cf also Jn 7 18). In Eph 3 13, Paul declares that his tribulations for those to whom he is writing are a glory or distinction to them, while in 1 Thess 2 20 he declares that the Thessalonian Christians are his glory and joy.

(2) As applied to God.—Closely related to this usage is the employment of the word to ascribe honor and praise to God; see Lk 17 18, where only the stranger returned to give glory to God; or Jn 9 24, where the man who had been born blind is bidden to give glory to God; or the phrase "to the glory of God" in Rom 15 7, where the meaning is to secure the honor and praise of God among men. Similar is the use in the frequently recurring doxologies such as, "Glory to God in the highest," "to him," that is, to God, "be glory," etc.

While the foregoing meanings are frequently illustrated in the NT, it is undoubtedly true that the characteristic use of the word doxa in the NT is in the sense of brightness, brilliance, splendor; and first of all, in the literal sense, referring to the brightness of the heavenly bodies, as in 1 Cor 15 40 f, or to the supernatural brightness which overcame Saul of Tarsus on the road to Damascus (Acts 22 11).

(3) As applied to the saints.—But the most common use of the word is to describe the brilliance which is the characteristic of all persons who share in the heavenly glory. Moses, Elijah and Jesus Himself have this glory on the Mt. of Transfiguration (Lk 9 31 f). It was the same glory which gave the angel who came out of heaven power to lighten the earth (Rev 18 1), and also which shone about the shepherds when the angel appeared unto them (Lk 2 9). Paul refers to this glory, when he speaks of the face of Moses as it appeared after God had spoken with him (2 Cor 3 7 f). And as in the case of Moses, so here, the source of this glory is God Himself, who is the God of glory (Acts 7 2, and frequently).

(4) As applied to the Messianic kingdom.—It is also used to describe the ideal Messianic kingdom of the future. It is applied to Christ to describe His royal majesty when He comes to set up His kingdom. So James and John ask to sit, one on His right hand and one on His left in His glory (Mk 10 37). Christ is to appear in glory with the angels (Mt 16 27 and often), for His condition in the coming age as it was before the incarnation is a condition of glory (Lk 24 26; Jn 17 5.22.24). But not merely the Messiah, but also all His followers shall share in the glory of the Messianic kingdom. This use is so common that it is scarcely necessary to illustrate it by reference. This glory is to be revealed to all Christians in the future (Rom 8 18. 21; 9 23; cf also 1 Cor 2 7; 2 Cor 4 17).

3. Its Ethical Significance

In all these cases it has a distinctly ethical signification, for it is the term which is used to describe the essential nature, the perfection of the Deity, and is shared by others because they are made partakers of the Divine nature. So Paul refers to "the glory of the incorruptible God" (Rom 1 23; cf also Eph 1 17 f, and often). And the essential nature of Christ comes to be described in the same way. He has glory as of the only begotten of the Father (Jn 1 14); he shows His glory in the performance of miracles (Jn 2 11); and like the Father, He is the Lord of glory (1 Cor 2 8).

As a vb. in the OT the most common signification of the word "glory" is, to make one's boast in or of anything, usually of the pious glorying in Yahweh (Jeh), but occasionally with some other reference, as in Jer 9 23 of man glorying in his riches, might or wisdom. In all these cases it represents the Heb hith-hallēl. In Ex 8 9 the phrase, "Have thou this glory over me," is the tr of the Heb hith-pā'ēr, and means take to thyself the honor or distinction as regards me. In 2 K 14 10 it translates the Heb hik-kābhēdh, "honor thyself," i.e. be satisfied with the home which you have already attained.

In the apocryphal books it means either "glorify thyself," the middle voice of the vb. doxázō, as in Sir 3 10, where the original Heb has hith-kabbēdh, or "to exult," "boast over," as in Jth 9 7, where it represents the Gr gauróomai; or "to boast," "take pride in," where it represents, as it does usually in the NT, the Gr kaucháomai (Sir 17 9; 24 1; 38 25; 39 8; 48 4, in the second and fourth of which cases it represents the Heb hith-pā'ēr).

In the NT the vb. is used 3 t in Jas, and several times in the Epp. of Paul, and everywhere is used to translate the vb. kaucháomai, or, in two cases in Jas, the same vb. is compounded with the preposition katá. In all these cases the meaning is "to take pride in," "to congratulate oneself," upon anything.

In this connection attention may be called to the use of the noun "glorying," once or twice rendered "to glory," where the meaning is either the occasion or ground of glorying, or sometimes the act of glorying. The original has kauchēma or kauchēsis. This usage occurs in Jas 4 16; He 3 6, and several times in the Epp. of Paul.

GLOWING, glō'ing, SAND (Isa 35 11). See Mirage.

GLUTTON, glut''n, GLUTTONOUS, glut''n-us (זָלַל, zālal, "to be lavish"; φάγος, phágos): "Glutton" (from glut, to swallow greedily) is the tr of zōlēl from zālal, "to shake or pour out," "to be lavish, a squanderer." In Dt 21 20, "This our son . . . . is a glutton, and a drunkard," the word may mean a squanderer or prodigal; ERV has "a riotous liver." In Prov 23 21, "For the drunkard and the glutton shall come to poverty" (following zōlē bhāsār, "squanderers of flesh," RV "gluttonous eaters of flesh"), "glutton" in the usual sense is intended; "a man gluttonous," "a gluttonous man" (RV) (phagos, "an eater," "a glutton") was a term applied to Christ in His freedom from asceticism (Mt 11 19; Lk 7 34).

RV has "idle gluttons" (m Gr, "bellies") for "slow bellies" (Tit 1 12); "gluttonous" "gluttons," for "riotous" (Prov 23 20; 28 7).

GNASH, nash (חָרַק, ḥāraḳ; βρυγμός, brugmós): "Gnash" is used of grinding or striking together the teeth in rage, pain or misery of disappointment. In the OT it is the tr of ḥāraḳ, a mimetic word, and represents for the most part rage, anger, hatred (Job 16 9, "He gnasheth upon me with his teeth," RV "hath gnashed upon me"; Ps 35 16; 37 12; 112 10, grief; Lam 2 16, contempt or derision); brúchō, "to gnash the teeth in rage," indicates anger, rage, LXX for ḥāraḳ (Acts 7 54, of Stephen, "They gnashed on him with their teeth"). The several instances of brugmos, "gnashing," in the Gospels seem to express disappointment rather than anger (Mt 8 12, "There shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth," RV "the weeping and the gnashing of teeth"; 13 42.50; 22 13; 24 51; 25 30; Lk 13 28—a vivid representation of the misery of disappointed expectations; cf Ecclus 30 10, "lest thou shalt gnash thy teeth in the end," gomphiázō, "to have the teeth set on edge"); trízō (Mk 9 18), which means "to give out a creaking, grating sound," "to screak," is used in the NT (in the above instance only) to mean "to grate or gnash with the teeth," indicating the effect of a paroxysm, RV "grindeth his teeth."

GNAT, nat (in EV, only in Mt 23 24, κώνωψ, kṓnōps. In Ex 8 16, for EV "lice," one of the plagues of Egypt, כִּנִּם, kinnim, כִּנִּים, kinnīm, or כִּנָּם, kinnām, we find in RVm "sand flies" or "fleas" [Gesenius "gnat"; Mandelkern "culex"]. For keᵉmō kēn [Isa 51 6], EV "in like manner," LXX ὥσπερ ταῦτα, hṓsper taúta, Vulg sicut haec, RVm has "like gnats," since כֵּן, kēn, elsewhere "thus," may here be taken to be a sing. of the form כִּנִּים, kinnīm, which occurs in Ex 8): In the NT passage, the difference between AV and RV should be noted. "Strain at a gnat, and swallow a camel" is changed to "strain out the gnat and swallow the camel," the reference being to the inconsistency of the Jewish religious leaders in taking extraordinary pains in some things, as in the preparation of food, while leaving weightier matters unattended to.

In Isa 51 6, the suggestion of RVm, "They that dwell therein shall die like gnats," seems a decided improvement on the "shall die in like manner" of EV, esp. as kēn, "thus" (see supra), is a repetition of keᵉmō, whose meaning is practically the same, "in like manner" being the rendering in EV of keᵉmō kēn.

As to the creatures, kinnīm, of the Egyp plague, there is little choice between "lice" of EV and the others suggested, except as we may be influenced by the LXX rendering, skníphes, which may mean "gnats" or "mosquitoes." See FLEA; LICE.

LITERATURE

Gnosticism—except perhaps in 1 Tim 6 20, where St. Paul warns Timothy against "the gnṓsis, which is falsely so called"—is not directly alluded to in the NT. Nevertheless its leaven was actually working, as will immediately be seen, and constituted a most serious peril in the apostolic church. "That strange, obscure movement, partly intellectual, partly fanatical . . . . in the 2d cent. spread with the swiftness of an epidemic over the church from Syria to Gaul" (Law, The Tests of Life, 26). It is therefore of high importance to gain a right conception of the nature of this potent anti-Christian influence. This is not easy. The difficulty in dealing with Gnosticism is that it was not a homogeneous system of either religion or philosophy, but embraced many widely diversified sects holding opinions drawn from a great variety of sources. "The infinitely varied shapes assumed by the systems render it almost impossible to classify them, or even to give an account of their leading ideas, which shall not be open to objection. We might as well try to classify the products of a tropical jungle, or the shapes and hues of the sunset clouds, which change under our view as we look at them" (Orr, The Progress of Dogma, 58).

I. General Definition.—On the general definition of Gnosticism a few authorities may be cited. "Gnosticism," says Dr. Gwatkin, "may be provisionally described as a number of schools of philosophy, oriental in general character, but taking in the idea of a redemption through Christ, and further modified in different sects by a third element, which may be Judaism, Hellenism, or Christianity . . . . the Gnostics took over only the idea of a redemption through Christ, not the full Christian doctrine, for they made it rather a redemption of the philosophers from matter, than a redemption of mankind from sin" (Early Church History to AD 313, II, 20).

Dr. Orr writes, "Gnosticism may be described generally as the fantastic product of the blending of certain Christian ideas—particularly that of redemption through Christ—with speculations and imaginings derived from a medley of sources (Gr, Jewish, Parsic; philosophies, religions, theosophies, mysteries) in a period when the human mind was in a kind of ferment, and when opinions of every sort were jumbled together in an unimaginable welter. It involves, as the name denotes, a claim to 'knowledge,' knowledge of a kind of which the ordinary believer was incapable, and in the possession of which 'salvation' in the full sense consisted. This knowledge of which the Gnostic boasted, related to the subjects ordinarily treated of in religious philosophy; Gnosticism was a species of religious philosophy" (The Early Church, 71).

Neander has described Gnosticism as "the first notable attempt to introduce into Christianity the existing elements of mental culture, and to render it more complete on the hitherto rather neglected side of theoretical knowledge; it was an attempt of the mind of the ancient world in its yearning after knowledge, and in its dissatisfaction with the present, to bring within its grasp and to appropriate the treasures of this kind which Christianity presented" (Antignostikus, Intro, 199).

Gnosticism accordingly comprehends in itself many previously existing tendencies; it is an amalgam into which quite a number of different elements have been fused. A heretical system of thought, at once subtle, speculative and elaborate, it endeavored to introduce into Christianity a so-called higher knowledge, which was grounded partly on the philosophic creed in which Greeks and Romans had taken refuge consequent on the gradual decay and breaking-up of their own religions, partly, as will be shown, on the philosophies of Plato and of Philo, and still more on the philosophies and theosophies and religions of the East, especially those of Persia and of India.

"For a long time the pagan beliefs had ceased to be taken seriously by thoughtful men and had been displaced by various creeds derived from philosophical speculation. These in themselves were abstract and unsatisfying, but had been partly vitalized by union with the theosophies of the East. An attempt was made on the part of this philosophical religion to effect an alliance with Christianity. A section of the church was dissatisfied with the simplicity of the gospel, and sought to advance to something higher by adopting the current speculations. . . . . The late books of the NT are all occupied, more or less, with this movement, which was the more dangerous as it threatened the church from within" (Professor E. Scott, The Apologetic of the NT, 14).

Gnosticism, though usually regarded as a heresy, was not really such: it was not the perverting of Christian truth; it came, rather, from outside. Having worked its way into the Christian church, it was then heretical. "Although it became a corrupting influence within the church, it was an alien by birth. While the church yet sojourned within the pale of Judaism, it enjoyed immunity from this plague; but as soon as it broke through these narrow bounds, it found itself in a world where the decaying religions and philosophies of the West were in acute fermentation under the influence of a new and powerful leaven from the East; while the infusion of Christianity itself into this fermenting mass only added to the bewildering multiplicity of gnostic sects and systems it brought forth" (Law, The Tests of Life, 26).

II. Sources of Gnosticism.—Mansel (in his work on The Gnostic Heresies, 32) sums up the principal sources of Gnosticism in these three, Platonism, the Pers religion, and the Buddhism of India. To Platonism it owed much of its philosophical form and tendencies. From the Dualism of the Pers religion it derived its speculations regarding the origin of evil, and much of what it taught about emanations. To Buddhism, he thinks, it owed the doctrine of the antagonism between matter and spirit, and the unreality of derived existence—the germ of Docetism. Mansel also holds that there is the possibility that Gnosticism derived certain of its features from the Kabbala (ḳabbālāh), or secret teaching of the Jews in the two books, the Ṣēpher yᵉçīrāh, or Book of Creation, and the Zōhar, or Book of Light. An influence of Buddhism on Gnosticism, however, may safely be doubted, as there is no reason to believe that the knowledge of Buddhist doctrine had so early penetrated into the West. The Jewish works named by Mansel are really products of the Middle Ages (Westcott, Intro to the Study of the Gospels, 144–45). The other sources named were really influential. We notice two—the Alexandrian philosophy and the Parsic dualism.

1. Alexandrian Philosophy

Alexandrian philosophy endeavored to unite Gr philosophy and Heb religion. Philo, the great Jewish commentator of Alexandria, had tried to interpret the ancient Jewish Scriptures by the aid of the Gr philosophy, to expound the OT in terms of Plato's thought and to discover allegorical meanings where none were intended. In Philo's teaching there is a sharp line drawn between God and the material world: with him God cannot exert any action upon the world of matter, except through intermediate agency, the Jewish angels and the heathen demons. Philo has much to say in regard to the Logos. His utterances on this subject may be compared with what is said of the attributes of "Wisdom" in ch 8 of the Book of Prov, and also with the Logos or "Word" of the Gospel of John. With Philo, the Logos is the power of God, or the Divine reason endowed with energy, and embracing within itself all subordinate powers. The Logos is impersonal in its relations to God; and herein is one huge difference between Philo's conception and that in the gospel. Philo teaches that the Logos is the only firstborn of God, the chief of the angels, the viceroy of God, and representative of man. See LOGOS.

According to Philo the creation of the universe was a gradual molding out of matter; hence arises evil. He also teaches the preëxistence of the soul, which is now imprisoned in the flesh. The wise man, therefore, will break the thraldom of the flesh, and will rise by a sort of ecstasy to the immediate vision of God. It will be seen how much of this teaching was assimilated by the various gnostic sects.

2. Zoroastrianism

The Zoroastrian or Pers system was based on the assumption that there existed two original and independent powers of good and evil, of light and darkness, Ormuzd (Ahura-Mazda), the wise Lord, and Ahriman (Angra-Mainyu), the wicked spirit. These powers were believed to be equal, and each supreme in his own domain. The earth, which was created by Ormuzd, became the battlefield of the two powers. Ahriman led away the first man and woman from their allegiance to Ormuzd, and so all evils result to mankind.

"In oriental (Pers) dualism," says Professor Bousset, "it is within this material world that the good and the evil powers are at war, and this world beneath the stars is by no means conceived as entirely subject to evil. Gnosticism has combined the two, the Gr opposition between spirit and matter, and the sharp Zoroastrian dualism, which, where the Gr mind conceived of a higher and a lower world, saw instead two hostile worlds standing in contrast to each other like light and darkness. And out of the combination of these two dualisms arose the teaching of Gnosticism with its thoroughgoing pessimism and its fundamental asceticism" ("Gnosticism," in Enc Brit, 11th ed, XII, 154).

III. Nature of Gnosticism.—"Gnosticism," says Dr. Gwatkin, "is Christianity perverted by learning and speculation" (Early Church History, 73). The intellectual pride of the Gnostics refined away the gospel into a philosophy. The clue to the understanding of Gnosticism is given in the word from which it is derived—gnōsis, "knowledge." Gnosticism puts knowledge in the place which can only rightly be occupied by Christian faith. To the Gnostic the great question was not the intensely practical one, "What must I do to be saved from sin?" but "What is the origin of evil?" "How is the primitive order of the universe to be restored?" In the knowledge of these and of similar questions, and in the answers given to these questions, there was redemption, as the Gnostic understood it.

> "These little gnostic sects and groups all lived in the conviction that they possessed a secret and mysterious knowledge, in no way accessible to those outside, which was not to be proved or propagated, but believed in by the initiated, and anxiously guarded as a secret. This knowledge of theirs was not based on reflection or scientific inquiry and proof, but on revelation. It was derived directly from the times of primitive Christianity, from the Saviour Himself and His disciples and friends, with whom they claimed to be connected by a secret tradition, or else from later prophets, of whom many sects boasted. It was laid down in wonderful mystic writings, which were in the possession of the various circles.
> "In short, Gnosticism in all its various sections, its form and its character, falls under the category of mystic religions, which were so characteristic of the religious life of decadent antiquity. In Gnosticism, as in the other mystic religions, we find the same contrast of the initiated and the uninitiated, the same loose organization, the same kind of petty sectarianism and mystery-mongering. All alike boast a mystic revelation and a deeply veiled wisdom" (Bousset, op. cit., 153).

Chief Points in Gnosticism

The questions, therefore, with which Gnosticism concerned itself were those of the relation of the finite and the infinite, the origin of the world and of evil, the cause, meaning, purpose and destiny of all things, the reason of the difference in the capacities and in the lot in life of individual men, the method of salvation. The following may be regarded as the chief points in the characteristics of the gnostic systems: (1) A claim on the part of the initiated to a special knowledge of the truth, a tendency to regard knowledge as superior to faith, and as the special possession of the more enlightened, for ordinary Christians did not possess this secret and higher doctrine. (2) The essential separation of matter and spirit, the former of these being essentially evil, and the source from which all evil has arisen. (3) An attempt at the solution of the problems of creation and of the origin of evil by the conception of a Demiurge, i.e. a Creator or Artificer of the world as distinct from the Supreme Deity, and also by means of emanations extending between God and the visible universe. It should be observed that this conception merely concealed the difficulties of the problem, and did not solve them. (4) A denial of the true humanity of Christ, a docetic Christology, which looked upon the earthly life of Christ and esp. on His sufferings on the cross as unreal. (5) The denial of the personality of the Supreme God, and the denial also of the free will of man. (6) The teaching, on the one hand, of asceticism as the means of attaining to spiritual communion with God, and, on the other hand, of an indifference which led directly to licentiousness. (7) A syncretistic tendency which combined certain more or less misunderstood Christian doctrines, various elements from oriental and Jewish and other sources. (8) The Scriptures of the OT were ascribed to the Demiurge or inferior Creator of the world, who was the God of the Jews, but not the true God. Some of these characteristic ideas are more obvious in one, and some of them in others of the gnostic systems. The relation of these ideas to Christian facts and doctrines is dealt with more particularly below.

IV. Gnosticism in the Christian Church.—(1) In the NT and the Apostolic Age.—The germ of Gnosticism in the Christian church made its appearance in the apostolic age, and is referred to by St. Paul in several of his epistles, notably in that to the Colossians and in the Pastoral Epistles. It is also referred to by the apostles Peter and Jude; references to it are found, besides, in the Apocalypse, the First Epistle of John and the Gospel of John.

1. Colossians

In Col a great deal is said regarding a false teaching, an insidious theosophist doctrine, the teachers of which were alienating the Christians in Colossae from the gospel, and were disseminating their speculations, which led to the worship of angels in contrast to the worship of Christ, to esoteric exclusiveness wholly opposed to the universality of the gospel, and to an asceticism injurious to Christian freedom, and derogatory to the human body as indwelt by the Holy Ghost. These tenets are identical with the more fully developed Gnosticism of the generation succeeding that of the apostles; and at the root of the Colossian false teaching there lay the same error which the gnostic mind had no way of meeting, viz. that there could be no connection between the highest spiritual agency, that is God, and gross corporeal matter.

From this theoretical basis arose another error—that as sin is inherent in the material substance of the body, therefore the only way by which perfection can be reached is to punish the body by asceticism, so that through the infliction of pain and the mortification of the flesh the region of pure spirit may be reached, and thus man may be etherealized and become like God. This ascetic tendency is wonderfully widespread; it reappears century after century, and shows itself in many forms of religion, not merely in distorted forms of Christianity, but in the Hindu religions, in Buddhism and elsewhere. In the Epistle to the Col, accordingly, there are definite references to ascetic practices which were inculcated by the false teachers at Colossae. The very terms which they employed have been preserved, "Touch not," "Taste not," "Handle not." It was in this way that these teachers had "at their own hand" invented a worship different from that of the Christian faith, which endeavored to attain the deliverance of the soul by "the neglecting of the body" (Col 2 21.23 AV). These gnostic teachers showed these tendencies still more boldly when Paul wrote his First Epistle to Tim (see below), for he describes them as "forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats" (1 Tim 4 3). These ascetic practices were afterward taught by various gnostic sects, the Encratites, the followers of Saturninus, and others.

These tendencies in the Colossian church St. Paul set himself to correct in his epistle. The method which he adopts is not so much to demolish error, as to establish the contrary truth, setting before the Colossians the person and work of Christ, Christ the Creator, Christ in whom there dwells not merely some or even much of the fulness of God, but all the fulness of the Godhead bodily; Christ the God of providence, the Upholder of all things, in whom matter and all creatures and all events "consist" and have their being; Christ the Reconciler who has reconciled us unto God through the blood of the cross. In view of truths like these, Colossian error and all other forms of Gnosticism crumble into decay and vanish. See COLOSSIANS, EPISTLE TO THE.

2. 1 Cor: "Knowledge" at Corinth

The Epistle to the Col is the first of the Pauline Epistles in which distinctively gnostic teaching is found in its attack upon the Christian faith. But from incidental notices in epistles of Paul written at an earlier period, it can be seen how congenial was the soil into which gnostic teaching was about to fall. For even in Corinth when Paul wrote his First Epistle to the church there, there had been a claim on the part of some that they possessed "knowledge," as if others were destitute of it, a claim which the apostle refuses to admit, and meets with stern resistance. They thought themselves "wise," they were given to disputing, they professed that they "all had knowledge" (1 Cor 8 1), nay, they could "know all mysteries and all knowledge" (13 2); but this knowledge did not edify them, did not build them up, it only puffed them up (8 1); it did not make them sympathetic or tender-hearted toward the weak (8 7–11).

3. Pastoral Epistles

In 1 Tim 6 20.21 Paul speaks of the "knowledge [the gnōsis] which is falsely so called; which some professing have erred concerning the faith." In other places in that epistle reference is made to tenets which are exactly those of Gnosticism. In 1 4 the apostle speaks of "fables and endless genealogies, which minister questionings, rather than a dispensation of God which is in faith." Philo had given a great impetus to an allegorizing interpretation of the OT. His writings were well known and were popular in many of the Jewish schools. These fanciful interpretations would hinder the growth of the Christian church; and this allegorizing of Scripture, joined to the teaching of the genealogies of the aeons, would leave no place for a Redeemer. In 4 3, as already noted, Paul describes ascetic practices which were regarded by their votaries as most meritorious. To abstain from marriage and from various kinds of food was the teaching of the Essenes and also of the Gnostics. This ascetic teaching was unnatural, as contrary to the constitution of the world, as that has been arranged by a holy and wise Creator, and it is also subversive of Christian liberty. Nothing can be esteemed common or unclean without throwing a reproach upon the Creator.

Antinomian development.—But another and contrary result also followed from the principles of the sinfulness of matter, and of redemption as deliverance from the flesh, viz. that there was an easier way of relief, by treating the soul and the body as separate entities which have nothing in common. Let the soul go its way on the wings of spiritual thought, while the body may indulge its fleshly desires. For, so it was held, as body and soul are entirely distinct in their nature, the spiritual cannot be defiled by anything, however carnal and gross, that the body can do. This was the antinomian development of Gnosticism. Many traces of this are apparent in the Pastoral Epistles and in 2 Pet and Jude. The Gnostics, against whom Paul warns Timothy, were "lovers of self, lovers of money, boastful, haughty, railers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affection, implacable, slanderers, without self-control, fierce, no lovers of good, traitors, headstrong, puffed-up, lovers of pleasure rather than lovers of God; holding a form of godliness, but having denied the power thereof" (2 Tim 3 2.3.4). Such, too, is the testimony borne regarding them by Ignatius (Law, The Tests of Life, 30): "They give no heed to love, caring not for the widow, the orphan or the afflicted, neither for those who are in bonds, nor for those who are released from bonds, neither for the hungry nor the thirsty." Such persons professed that they knew God, but by their works they denied Him; they were "abominable, and disobedient, and unto every good work reprobate" (Tit 1 16). They enticed others into sins of impurity (2 Tim 3 5.6). They allured others through the lusts of the flesh; and the means by which they succeeded in doing this was that they spoke great swelling words of vanity, and the end was that in their destroying of others they themselves also were surely destroyed (2 Pet 2 12.18). They were ungodly men, turning the grace of God into lasciviousness and denying our only Master and Lord, Jesus Christ; they gave themselves up to the sins of the flesh, and ran riotously after error in hope of a gain in money; they were sensual men, not having the Spirit (Jude vs 4.8.11.19). The entire Ep. of Jude is directed against this antinomian and licentious development of Gnosticism, and against its terrible permission of an unholy life (see below on Book of Rev).

4. 1 John

In the First Epistle of John there is a distinct polemical purpose. There is no book of the NT which is more purposeful in its attack of error. There is "the spirit of error" (1 Jn 4 6), opposing the Spirit of truth. "Many false prophets are gone out into the world" (4 1), and this from the church itself, "They went out from us, but they were not of us" (2 19); and these false prophets are distinctly named "the antichrist" (2 22) and "the liar" (ib), and "the deceiver and the antichrist" (2 Jn ver 7). This peril, against which the apostle writes, and from which he seeks to defend the church, was Gnosticism, as is proved by what is said again and again in the epistle of the characteristics of this insidious and deadly teaching.

(1) Gnostic claims.—The gnostic claim to knowledge throws light upon many passages in this epistle. St. John refers to his opponents' using such phrases as "I know God," "I abide in Christ," "I am in the light." These lofty claims were made by persons who did not love their brethren on earth, who did not walk in Christ's footsteps, and who were destitute of love. The apostle therefore describes these lofty claims as false, because those who made them possessed neither love nor obedience.

In contrast to these gnostic claims—for those who made them were no other than the early Gnostics—St. John shows how the Christ of history is the Christ of experience; for those to whom he is writing know Christ, who is from the beginning, and they know the Father. "We know him that is true, and we are in him that is true, even in his Son Jesus Christ. This is the true God, and eternal life" (5 20). This knowledge of God and communion with Him are attained, not by gnostic speculation, but by the obedience of faith, the outcome of which is brotherly love and a life in which the Christian walks even as Christ did (2 6). And thus also obedience and brotherly love are the test of the profession which any man may make that he knows God. "Every one also that doeth righteousness is begotten of him" (2 29); "Whosoever doeth not righteousness is not of God, neither he that loveth not his brother" (3 10).

(2) Its loveless nature.—Gnosticism was distinguished by an unethical, loveless intellectualism. This seems to be the explanation of the false teaching against which this epistle is directed. The apostle describes the dry head-knowledge which left the heart and life untouched by love, and which led men, while they professed to love God, nevertheless to remain destitute of love to their fellow-men. They did not fold their human brethren to their hearts, they were dead to the fact that where pity dwells, the love of God dwells also. In Gnosticism knowledge was in itself the supreme end and purpose of life, the sum of highest good to which a man could attain, the crown of life. The system was loveless to the core.

(3) Docetism.—Now, when the attempt was made to amalgamate these gnostic ideas with the Christian faith, the inevitable result was Docetism. Just because God cannot have any immediate contact with matter, therefore the incarnation of Almighty God in the person of the Lord Jesus Christ is inconceivable. From this position it is, of course, only a step to deny that the incarnation and the true human life of Christ ever took place at all.

(4) The Antichrist.—The Antichrist of the First Epistle of John is docetic Gnosticism. The soul of the apostle rushes onward, with glowing zeal for the honor of his Master whom Gnosticism dishonored, to identify personally the historical Jesus with the Divine Being, "the Son of God," "the Word of Life," "the Christ." "Who is the liar but he that denieth that Jesus is the Christ? This is the antichrist, even he that denieth the Father and the Son. Whosoever denieth the Son, the same hath not the Father: he that confesseth the Son hath the Father also" (2 22.23). It should be noted that the last clause in ver 23, which is printed in italics in AV, is restored in RV to its rightful position in the original text. "Every spirit that confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is of God: and every spirit that confesseth not Jesus is not of God: and this is the spirit of the antichrist, whereof ye have heard that it cometh; and now it is in the world already" (4 2.3).

(5) Its antinomian side.—The antinomian side of Gnosticism is not so directly referred to in the First Epistle of John as Docetism is; but evidences are manifest that the apostle had it clearly before him. "Little children," he writes, "let no man lead you astray: he that doeth righteousness is righteous, even as he is righteous: he that doeth sin is of the devil" (3 7.8). And these were the methods by which those deceivers endeavored to lead the members of the church astray They alleged that sin was a thing indifferent in itself. It made no difference to the spiritual man whether he sinned with his body or not. It is for this reason that the apostle, in opposing those teachers, insists that "sin is lawlessness" (3 4); "All unrighteousness is sin" (5 17); "Whosoever is begotten of God doeth no sin" (3 9); "In this the children of God are manifest, and the children of the devil: whosoever doeth not righteousness is not of God, neither he that loveth not his brother" (3 10). The whole passage presupposes, as familiar to its readers, a doctrine of moral indifferentism, according to which the status of the 'spiritual' man is not to be tested by the commonplace facts of moral conduct" (The Tests of Life, 34). See JOHN, FIRST EPISTLE OF.

5. "To Know the Depths": Rev

As time advanced, and the later books of the NT were written, Gnosticism assumed more of its distinctive peculiarities. "Those who had knowledge" regarded themselves as a superior order of believers. One of their phrases was "to know the depths" (Rev 2 24 AV), and this was valued far more highly than love and obedience. "From this language, we may, I think, infer the existence of an Ophite sect, boasting of its peculiar gnōsis, before the date of the Apocalypse" (Mansel, The Gnostic Heresies, 105). The claim of the Ophites was that they alone knew "the depths." "Yes," is the apostle's reply to claims of this kind, "yes, the depths, but not of God, the depths of Satan"; for such is a just description of a teaching which ascribed the origin and the working of evil to God. It is in the light of gnostic teaching of this sort that the meaning can be seen of the same apostle's language in his First Epistle, "And this is the message which we have heard from him and announce unto you, that God is light, and in him is no darkness at all" (1 Jn 1 5).

The Nicolaïtans.—In the Epistles to the Seven Churches in the Apocalypse there are other references to Gnosticism. Who the Nicolaitans were (2 6.15) is not absolutely certain; but it is not unlikely that they were so called because of their having assumed the name of "Nicolaüs, a proselyte of Antioch" (Acts 6 5). The first step to the reception of gentile believers into the Christian church on an equal footing with the Jews may have been the appointment of Nicolaüs as one of the first deacons, for the facts that he was a native of Antioch and a proselyte, show that he had been a heathen by birth. And it is noteworthy to find such a person appointed to office in the church at so very early a period, even before the conversion of the apostle Paul. The Nicolaitans therefore may have distorted in an antinomian sense the doctrine taught by Nicolaüs, who in all probability proclaimed the liberty of the gospel, as his fellow-deacon, Stephen, did (Acts 7 throughout). But the liberty claimed by the Nicolaitans was liberty to sin. They are mentioned in the Epistle to Ephesus, and their deeds are characterized as deeds which Christ hates (Rev 2 6). Their name occurs again in the Epistle to Pergamum, and there also their doctrine is described as a doctrine which the Lord hates (ver 15). Their teaching was one of licentiousness—eating things sacrified to idols, and committing fornication (ver 14). Again in the Epistle to Thyatira, the Gnostics are spoken of as practising the same evil courses, and as holding a doctrine of "the depths of Satan" (vs 20.21.24 AV)—see above. The persons mentioned in the Epistle to Philadelphia were also evidently Gnostics. They are described as being "of the synagogue of Satan" (3 9).

"In the language of St. Jude, as in that of St. Peter, which it closely imitates, we may clearly discern a reference to the gnostic sect of the Nicolaitans mentioned by name in Rev. The comparison in all these passages, of the error condemned with that of Balaam, is decisive as to the identity of the persons intended. The other characteristics noted by St. Peter are also repeated by St. Jude—their denial of the Lord, their profligate lives, their contempt of government, and evil speaking of dignities and of things that they know not, their pollution of the feasts of charity, their great swelling words. The antinomian, no less than the ascetic side of Gnosticism, seems by this time to have fully manifested itself" (Mansel, The Gnostic Heresies, 71).

V. The Christian Antithesis.—The principal points of contrast between Gnosticism and Christian teaching in regard to leading doctrines will now be apparent, and can be briefly summarized.

1. God and the World

According to the Gnostics, God is thought of as the ultimate, nameless, unknowable Being, of whom they speak as the "Abyss." He is perfect, but the material world is alien to the Divine nature. How then does it come to exist at all? What is the source of its imperfections and evils?

How did the world originate?—The Gnostic answer is that the plērōma or fulness of the Deity (see Fulness) could flow out in no other way than in emanations or aeons or angels, all of which are necessarily imperfect, the highest of these emanations or aeons or angels being more spiritual than the grade immediately below it. Of these aeons there is a gradation so numerous, that at length the lowest of them is almost wholly corporeal, the spiritual element having been gradually diminished or eliminated, until at last the world of man and of matter is reached, the abode of evil. In this way the gulf is bridged between God and the world of mankind. The highest aeons approximate closely to the Divine nature, so spiritual are they and so nearly free from matter. These form the highest hierarchy of angels, and these as well as many other grades of the angelic host are to be worshipped.

In opposition to this view, Christian faith worships God as the free self-sufficient Creator, infinitely good and wise and powerful and holy, the Author of all things, and affirms creation as an incomprehensible fact revealed to faith, and which rises above the grasp of the understanding. "By faith we understand that the worlds have been framed by the word of God, so that what is seen hath not been made out of things which do appear" (He 11 3 AV).

2. Evil

The doctrine of evil follows directly from the above account of the relation of God to the world. According to Gnosticism the manifestation of God is possible only through self-limitation on His part, for in His essence God is the unfathomable Abyss. Through this Divine self-limitation are evolved, first, the Divine powers or attributes, which previously were hidden in the Abyss of His being. These Divine powers (the plērōma) become the principles of all further developments of life. Life continues to be unfolded in such a way that its successive grades sink farther and farther from the purity of God, the life is feebler the nearer they come to matter, with which, at length, they blend. Such, according to Gnosticism, is the origin of evil.

Whenever men are not content with acknowledging evil to be the act of their own free will, which has chosen to forsake its absolute dependence upon God; whenever they go beyond this and seek for another origin of evil, then one of two results follows. They either limit the holiness of God, and find the cause of evil in God Himself, thus annihilating all distinction between good and evil—which is Pantheism; or they limit the power of God by granting the existence of an eternal evil power beyond the control of God—which is Dualism. In avoiding Pantheism, Gnosticism accepted the dualistic solution, ascribing to evil an eternal self-subsistent nature, which is to make it absolute as God Himself is. As absolute self-subsistence can be affirmed of none but God, the eternally self-subsistent evil of Dualism must be God, which it cannot possibly be, because it is not good. Here is the self-contradiction on which Gnosticism was wrecked.

(1) The Christian doctrine of sin.—Directly contrary to this is the Christian doctrine, according to which evil is the refusal of the creature-will to lean absolutely and utterly on God, upon His care and love and upholding grace. Sin is that which ought not to be; it has no right to exist at all; it is defiance of God; it is moral transgression; its magnitude cannot be exaggerated. If it could, it would dethrone God. It has defied His righteousness and wisdom and holiness and even His grace. Sin therefore is dealt with by God in two ways, either by direct punishment or by redemption, in which provision is made for its removal by its being borne by the Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world.

The gnostic idea of the origin of evil follows at once from, and is inseparably involved in, their dualistic interpretation of nature. The question "What is sin?" is no mere academic or philosophical discussion, in which one opinion may be as good as another. "Everything in Christianity is connected more or less directly with the great facts of Sin and Redemption; and the plan of Redemption, which is the essence of Christianity, cannot be rightly understood until the doctrine of Sin be adequately recognized and established. Here, certainly, if anywhere, Christian theology must fight pro aris et focis" (Julius Müller, quoted in Dr. Orr's Sin as a Problem of Today, 6).

(2) Sin and the moral law.—The universality of sin, its persistence, its gravity, its power to destroy and to deprave—these are facts which can hardly be exaggerated. To view sin aright, it is impossible to leave out of sight its relation to moral law, to God, and to His kingdom. Sin is the transgression of moral law; it is transgression also against a holy God, of whose character and will moral law is a transcript or reflection. "Sin is transgression against God, the substitution of the creature-will for the will of the Creator; revolt of the creature-will from God" (Sin as a Problem of Today, 7). It is the resolve of the will to make itself independent of God and to renounce His authority. Sin is self-will, false independence, freedom which ends in bondage and misery.

But in Gnosticism sin is something quite different; it is not the act and the disposition of the human will in rebellion against God; it is only a physical fact or quality inherent in the body and in matter everywhere. Redemption therefore does not consist in the work of Christ for us on the cross, and the applying of the benefits of that work by the Holy Spirit of God in the renewal of the moral nature of man. Redemption is simply each man's efforts to secure emancipation from the flesh—from physical evil.

3. Christ and Redemption

It is easily seen that a system of this kind had no need of Christ and leaves no place for redemption in the Christian sense of that term. Redemption in this scheme of thought is not deliverance from sin, it is not removal of guilt and renewing of the mind. It is something quite different, and consists in the restoration of the cosmic order and illumination of the mind of the select few through knowledge. Christ is not the Saviour who saves His people from their sins, and who gives them unceasingly, through union with Himself, deliverance from the power of sin. He is only one of the aeons, the highest of them. He is an originated being, and not God. There is thus no place in Gnosticism either for the creation of the universe by God, or for the incarnation and work of Christ. Once grant that matter is essentially evil, and there is excluded the possibility of Christ's having assumed a true human nature, simply for the one reason that the world and human nature are originally and necessarily evil. Thus, as already seen, we are landed in Docetism.

The Christology of the Gnostics accordingly assumed one of two types. "One class of early Gnostics separated the spiritual being Christ from the man Jesus; they supposed that the Christ entered Jesus at the time of His baptism, and left Him at the moment of His crucifixion. Thus the Christ was neither born as a man nor suffered as a man. In this way they obviated the difficulty, insuperable to the gnostic mind, of conceiving the connection between the highest spiritual agency and gross corporeal matter, which was involved in the Catholic doctrine of the Incarnation and Passion, and which Gnostics of another type more effectually set aside by the doctrine of Docetism, i.e. by assuming that the human body of Our Lord was only a phantom body, and not real flesh and blood. Irenaeus represents the former class as teaching that 'Jesus was the receptacle of the Christ,' and that the Christ 'descended upon Him from heaven in the form of a dove, and after He had declared to mankind the nameless Father, entered again into the plērōma imperceptibly and invisibly.' Here no names are given. But in another passage he ascribes precisely the same doctrine, without however naming the plērōma, to Cerinthus" (Lightfoot, Col, 264). How strenuously this doctrine was combated in apostolic circles has already been shown in speaking of St. John's First Epistle.

4. Asceticism and Antinomianism

The necessary consequence of the gnostic theory in an ascetic morality which passed over by sure steps into antinomian license has likewise been fully illustrated in the foregoing, and need not be further enlarged on. The whole has its root in a false intellectualism, to which the gospel in its inculcation of humility, faith and dependence upon God's Spirit for guidance into truth is, in its inmost principle, opposed.

VI. Harnack's View of Gnosticism.—Harnack's view of Gnosticism differs from that now given in laying the chief emphasis on its Judaeo-Hellenistic side. He describes well how, when Christianity appeared, an extensive spiritualizing or allegorizing of the OT had already taken place. "This spiritualizing was the result of a philosophic view of religion, and this philosophic view was the outcome of a lasting influence of Gr philosophy, and of the Gr spirit generally, upon Judaism. In consequence of this view, all facts and sayings of the OT in which one could not find his way, were allegorized. Nothing was what it seemed, but was only the symbol of something invisible. The history of the OT was here sublimated to a history of the emancipation of reason from passion" (History of Dogma, I, 223). This allegorical interpretation disclosed to the mature mind a wealth of relations, of hints and of intuitions from the OT, which to the uninitiated was only a dry record of fact. This view of the OT gave its readers a strange interest, which proceeded to transfer their ancient Jewish hopes into the world of Gr philosophy, and transformed the result into a metaphysic. When these thinkers entered the Christian church, Christian hopes and terms were added to the already existing Judaic-Gr-Alexandrian compound, and such was Gnosticism. It represented the acute secularizing or Hellenizing of Christianity. The Gnostics "are therefore those Christians, who, in a swift advance, attempted to capture Christianity for Hellenic culture, and Hellenic culture for Christianity, and who gave up the OT in order to facilitate the conclusion of the covenant between the two powers and make it possible to assert the absoluteness of Christianity" (p. 227).

Harnack indeed grants that there were other elements in Gnosticism, but he strongly asserts that the Gr element was the predominating one. In this he seems to us to be in error. Laying the chief emphasis on Hellenism, he fails to give the due and preponderating place to eastern dualism. As already seen, an eastern dualistic theosophy is the chief element in Gnosticism. This eastern source is also acknowledged by Harnack, but only as if it were subsidiary to Hellenism. As he regards it, "Gnosticism was an acute Hellenizing of Christianity" (p. 230).

In regard to the fundamental philosophic doctrines of Gnosticism, the indefinable nature of the Divine primeval Being, the sinfulness of matter, the fulness of God in aeons, the Demiurge, etc, Harnack agrees generally with other writers, and adds, "All these are ideas for which we find the way prepared in the philosophy of the time, anticipated by Philo, and represented in neo-Platonism as the great final result of Gr philosophy" (p. 233).

VII. Influence and Development of Gnosticism.—Gnosticism is peculiarly the heresy of the 2d cent., and in itself a proof of the extent to which a knowledge of the Christian faith had, at that early period, penetrated in literary and philosophical circles. Though it is true that Christianity at first influenced chiefly the humbler classes, yet it was not among these persons that the various gnostic heresies arose.

1. Gnosticism Not a Heresy of the Humbler Classes

Gnosticism "was a product which did not spring up spontaneously in the minds of the mechanics and slaves and women and children, whom most, like Celsus, suppose to have formed the bulk of the Christian communities, but could only have taken its rise in minds of a more cultured and speculative cast. This, indeed, was its claim—to be a religion of 'gnōsis' or knowledge, for the more highly trained or élite. It could only exist at all, therefore, as the result of a Christian ferment which had entered these speculative circles, and was there powerfully at work. Baur rightly appreciates the situation, when he says: 'Gnosticism gives the clearest proof that Christianity had now come to be one of the most important factors in the history of the time, and it shows esp. what a mighty power of attraction the new Christian principles possessed for the highest intellectual life then to be found either in the pagan or in the Jewish world.' Above all, these systems are a striking witness to the impression produced on the heathen mind by the great Christian idea of redemption. 'When the gnostic systems,' says Neander, 'describe the movement which was produced in the kingdom of the Demiurge by the appearance of Christ as the manifestation of a new and mighty principle which had entered the precincts of this lower world, they give us to understand how powerful was the impression which the contemplation of the life of Christ and His influence on humanity, had left on the minds of the founders of these systems, making all earlier institutions seem to them as nothing in comparison with Christianity.' We must beware, therefore, of underestimating either the extent or the intensity of this great intellectual ferment set up by the gospel in the heart of heathenism" (Orr, Neglected Factors, etc, 196).

2. Cerinthus: His Teaching

The earliest of the Gnostics known to us by name is Cerinthus, the antagonist of the apostle John. It seems to be beyond reasonable doubt that these two encountered each other at Ephesus. Irenaeus relates on the authority of those who heard the story from Polycarp how the apostle and Cerinthus met in the public baths in that city. When St. John discovered that Cerinthus was in the same building with him, he instantly left, exclaiming that he could not remain while Cerinthus, the enemy of God and of man, was there. From the accounts which have been preserved of Cerinthus and of his teaching, it can be gathered that he taught that the world was created not by the Supreme God, but by an inferior power, and that he also taught a docetic theory of the Incarnation. Caius of Rome, a disciple of Irenaeus, records that Cerinthus held that there would be a millennium of unrestrained sensuality. Dionysius of Alexandria (c 260 AD) more than confirms this. "Thus so far as they go, the historical data harmonize with the internal evidence of the Epistle [of John] itself, in giving the impression that the different tendencies it combats are such as were naturally combined in one consistently developed gnostic system, and that the object of its polemic is, throughout, one and the same" (The Tests of Life, 37).

As regards the Gospel of John there is the testimony of Irenaeus, that it was written to oppose that form of Gnosticism which was taught by Cerinthus, and, before him, by the Nicolaitans. The nature of that heresy may be stated in the words of Irenaeus himself:

> "A certain Cerinthus," he says, "in Asia, taught that the world was not made by the Supreme God, but by some power altogether separate and distinct from that Sovereign Power which is over the universe, and one ignorant of the God who is over all things. He taught, moreover, that Jesus was not born of a virgin (for this seemed to him to be impossible), but was the son of Joseph and Mary, born after the manner of other men; though preëminent above other men in justice and prudence and wisdom; and that after His baptism the Christ, in the form of a dove, descended upon Him from that Sovereign Power which is over all things; and that He then announced the unknown Father and wrought miracles; but that, at the end, the Christ departed again from Jesus, and that Jesus suffered and was raised from the dead, while the Christ continued impassible, as a spiritual being" (Mansel, The Gnostic Heresies, 74).

3. The Gospel of John

Such a passage as Jn 19 34.35 seems to refer to docetic Gnosticism, and to be a personal protest against it. After describing the piercing of Christ's side by the soldier's spear, and how "straightway there came out blood and water," the apostle adds, "And he that hath seen hath borne witness, and his witness is true: and he knoweth that he saith true, that ye also may believe." There are many other passages which seem to be directed against Docetism, e.g. "The Word became flesh, and dwelt among us (and we beheld his glory)" (1 14); "Jesus therefore, being wearied with his journey, sat thus by the well" (4 6); "Reach hither thy finger, and see my hands; and reach hither thy hand, and put it into my side: and be not faithless, but believing" (20 27).

Cerinthus seems to have taught that the religion of Christ was identical with undiluted Mosaism, including even circumcision and the earthly kingdom of the future. The Cerinthian theory, however, was held under various forms by its adherents, some teachers holding that the God of the OT was, at the best, a subordinate angel of limited power, wisdom and goodness, and that the creation of the world was very imperfect. Others went so far as to identify the God of the OT with Satan. The ethic of systems such as these was antinomian, sometimes even going the length of libertinism.

4. Various Sects

Generally, the forms under which Gnosticism appeared varied greatly in different periods. Some went farther than others from the Christian faith. Some communities, such as the Encratites, laid the greatest stress on the necessity for asceticism; other communities were wholly docetic; the Carpocratians taught the philosophy and communism of Plato. One of these teachers, Epiphanes, was honored as a god, and this sect crowned the image of Jesus along with those of Pythagoras, Plato and Aristotle. Further, there were impostors of all varieties: magicians, soothsayers, jugglers, deceivers and hypocrites, "who appeared using mighty words with a host of unintelligible formulae and taking up with scandalous ceremonies in order to rob men of their money" (Harnack, op. cit., 239), and even for viler purposes.

(1) The Ophites.—Gnosticism, before reaching its full development, is chiefly represented by the ophite sects or systems. These were so named from the word óphis, "serpent," to which they paid honor as the symbol of intelligence. They held that the Creator of the world was an ignorant and imperfect being, Ialdaboth, the Son of Chaos; and that it was a meritorious act when the serpent persuaded Adam and Eve to disobey him. There were several of the ophite sects, such as the Cainites, who reversed all the standards of moral judgment, choosing as their heroes the persons whom the Bible condemned, such as Cain, the men of Sodom, Esau and Korah.

(2) Valentinus.—By the time of Justin Martyr (c 150 AD), Gnosticism had become divided into a variety of sects and schools, Valentinians, Basilideans, Saturninians and Marcionites. In the Valentinian system, Christ and the Holy Spirit were two aeons. The Valentinians granted that ordinary Christians were better than the heathen, and that they might look forward to a kind of salvation; even now ordinary Christians occupied a middle position, better than the "hylic" or "psychic," but inferior to the "pneumatic" or "spiritual," as the Gnostics termed themselves.

(3) Basilides.—The Basilideans take their name from Basilides of Alexandria, a man of powerful intellect. He and his son Isidore taught this system, which was afterward considerably modified for the purpose of popular apprehension. The world is continuously evolved from a pansperma or "seed of the world," in which all things were originally potentially contained. It is ruled by two great Archons, who yet subserve the designs of the Supreme. There are no aeons, but the highest "light" descends through the successive spheres till it rests on Jesus of Nazareth. The process is complete when the Divine element ("sonship") is all drawn out and restored to God; oblivion then falls on lower intelligences. Many fine sayings are attributed to Basilides, e.g. "I will say anything rather than doubt the goodness of Providence" (Orr, The Early Church, 75).

(4) Saturninus.—The Saturninians were so called from Saturninus, said to be a disciple of Menander, who in turn is said to have been a disciple of Simon Magus. The system of Saturninus is marked both by a strong dualism and by a gloomy asceticism. He is also reported to have been one of the founders of the Encratite heresy, which condemned marriage. Tatian, Justin Martyr's disciple, became a member of this gnostic sect, holding, it is alleged, the usual theory of aeons, and that there was a Demiurge, who was not the Supreme God.

(5) Marcion.—Marcion, a native of Pontus, taught in Rome c 140–55 AD. His system differs much from ordinary gnostic theories, except that he absolutely distinguished between the God of the OT, who is regarded as merely great, harsh, rigorous, and the good God of the NT, who is wholly love. He also held to the usual gnostic dualism and docetism. Marcion's system has been described as an overstrained Paulinism, as he lays the stress on faith, not on knowledge. Marcion was the author of a book called the Anthitheses, which contrasted the OT with the NT. He also drew up a canon of Scripture, which contained only one gospel, viz. Lk in a mutilated state, and ten Epp. of Paul. Marcion was a rigorous ascetic. In the Lord's Supper he allowed only water to be used instead of wine. The Marcionites refused baptism to married persons. This sect or "church" endured for several centuries.

5. Relation to the OT

"All the gnostic systems had one feature in common, viz. that they regarded the OT and the NT as revelations of two different Gods, and considered the mission of Christ to proceed from a higher power than the God of the Jewish religion, who was identified with the Demiurge, or Maker of the world. But under this common assumption there was room for two very opposite estimates of the older revelation and of the God whom it reveals. Some of the gnostic sects regarded the Demiurge as being altogether alien from and opposed to the Supreme God; others considered him merely as a subordinate power, inferior but not hostile to the Supreme God, and acting before the coming of a more perfect revelation, as his unconscious organ" (Mansel, The Gnostic Heresies, 45). "There can be no doubt that the gnostic propaganda was seriously hindered by the inability to organize and discipline churches, which is characteristic of all philosophic systems of religion" (Harnack, History of Dogma, I, 252). "From about 210 they ceased to be a factor of the historical development, though the church of Constantine and Theodosius was alone really able to suppress them" (ib, 251).

6. The Christian Verities

In contrast to Gnosticism the Christian church held fast to these great facts, that Jesus Christ is the Son of God, preëxistent before the Incarnation, and manifest in the flesh and crucified for us men and for our salvation; that He rose from the dead; that the OT is a true revelation of the one supreme and holy God, the Creator of all things. Dualism, the eternity of matter and its inherent evil, as well as Docetism and oriental mythologies were accordingly rejected as contrary to the Christian faith.

7. Influence on Theology

During the period of the prevalence of Gnosticism there took place the earlier developments of Christian theology. Gnosticism gave a powerful impetus to the formation of a NT canon of Scripture, and to the shaping of the earliest creed. See Apostles' Creed.

8. Truth Underlying Docetism

In the revulsion from Gnosticism and Docetism it should not be forgotten that there is truth to be found even amid the errors of these systems. Docetism was an overstatement of a great truth, an overstatement so large as to destroy the true humanity of Our Lord. But the truth in Docetism is that the eternal Christ touches and appeals to and has a definite relationship to and actually influences every human heart; and also, that, to the Christian believer, Christ is more and does more than this; Christ dwells in the believer's heart by faith, "Christ in you, the hope of glory" (Col 1 27). "Docetism was not all folly. Rather we may regard it as one primitive form of the assertion of that mystical element which has never been wanting to Christianity from the first days until now, and we may be sure, never will be wanting to it" (Sanday, Christologies Ancient and Modern, 9).

VIII. Modern Gnosticism.—Gnosticism in its ancient form has passed away, but it is interesting to observe how its spirit reappears from time to time in modern days. Gnosticism, as already seen, is not one aspect of thought alone, but many. And in one form or another it is seen again and again. For example, the modern denial of the virgin birth of Our Lord is that form of Gnosticism which taught that the man Jesus became Christ only at His baptism, when the Holy Ghost descended upon Him from heaven.

Phases of gnostic teaching are reproduced in modern pantheistic philosophies and other forms of religious doctrine, which hold that there has been no objective atonement and no resurrection of Christ from the dead. "Basilides with his powerful speculative grasp and all-embracing evolutionary process might be termed the Hegel of the movement; Valentinus with his robe of fantasy and triple fall and redemption was its Schelling; Marcion with his severe practical bent, his doctrine of faith, and his antitheses of the just God and the good, might without straining be termed its Ritschl" (Orr, The Progress of Dogma, 59).

"Fichte said, 'There were no external realities at all, they were the mere objectivity of the subject or creations of the inward eye'; after Fichte came Schelling, and Schelling said, 'Then this creating eye is God's own eye'; and after Schelling came Hegel, and Hegel said that 'God and man are one, and God all men, and all men God, and the whole universe God eternally thinking in the process of development,' and that or something like it is Hegelianism. I feel in studying this philosophy, as Baron Humboldt says he felt, when he experienced the first shock of an earthquake. I feel a dreadful sense of restlessness and insecurity. The ground seems to give way beneath, and the earth and the heaven to dissolve, the universe becomes a dream, a myth" (W. B. Robertson, D.D., Martin Luther, German Student Life, etc, 138).

"Philosophy," says Mansel, "striving after a first principle which shall be one and simple and unconditioned and incapable of all further analysis in thought, is naturally tempted to soar above that complex combination of attributes which is implied in our conception of personality, and in endeavoring to simplify and purify our representation of the Divine nature, ends by depriving it of every attribute which can make God the object of any religious feeling or the source of any moral obligation" (The Gnostic Heresies, 11). God is no longer the author and source of goodness and truth and moral law, but the mind is occupied with the metaphysical relation between God and the world, as absolute and relative, cause and effect, principle and consequence, and God becomes identical with the world.

It is easily seen how teaching of this sort strikes at the root of all religion and morality. The personality of God, the personality and free will of man, the existence of moral evil, the incarnation of our Lord Jesus Christ, the redemption which He accomplished for the world, His resurrection, the whole significance of His person and His work—all is denied. This is the spirit and the meaning of Gnosticism.

Dr. Gwatkin sums up the matter thus: "Gnosticism undermined Christian monotheism by its distinction of the Creator from the Supreme, Christian morals by its opposition of the philosopher to the unlearned, Christian practice by its separation of knowledge from action; and it cut away the very basis of the gospel whenever it explained away its history. In every case it had got hold of truth on one side—the reality of evil in the world, the function of knowledge in religion, the difference between the letter and the spirit; but fragments of truth are not enough for a gospel, which is false if all truth is not summed up in Christ. Therefore there could be no peace between the gnostic illuminati and the Christian churches" (Early Church History, II, 68).

JOHN RUTHERFURD

GO (הָלַךְ, hālakh, יָלַךְ, yālakh, בּוֹא, bō', יָצָא, yāçā'; ἄγω, ágō, ὑπάγω, hupágō, ἀναβαίνω, anabaínō, ἔρχομαι, érchomai, ἀπέρχομαι, apérchomai, πορεύομαι, poreúomai): "Go" ("went," etc) occurs very frequently in the Eng. Bible, and is the tr of a great many different Heb and Gr terms. As the word implies movement of all kinds, physical and mental, it has naturally many applications.

1. In the OT

In the OT hālakh and yālakh are among the commonest words, meaning "to go" in its original sense of "to walk," but also in the most varied senses, according to the verbal conjugations, etc, the prep. attached, and the words in connection with which the terms stand; hālakh and yālakh are often used figuratively (tr^{d} "to walk," etc) for to live, to pursue a way of life, e.g. "to walk ever in his ways" (Dt 19 9; cf Ps 15 2; 89 30; 1 K 2 3 f; 3 3, etc); to die, "He departed [Heb "went"] without being desired" (2 Ch 21 20); bō', properly "to go in," "to enter" (e.g. Gen 7 9), is very common, and yāçā', "to go or come out," also occurs frequently; yāçā' has frequently the meaning "to go forth," e.g. Gen 8 7, "He sent forth a raven, and it went forth." Other frequent words are yāradh, "to go down" (Gen 11 7, etc); 'ālah, "to go or come up" (Gen 2 6, etc; Isa 15 5, "go it up," AV); used also figuratively, e.g. "to rise up or excel," "Thou excellest them all" (Prov 31 29), "to come up on the heart," to be remembered, "The former things shall not be remembered, nor come into mind" (Isa 65 17; cf Jer 3 16); 'ābhar, "to go or pass over," "to cross" (Gen 41 46, etc), also used figuratively "to pass away," e.g. "as chaff that passeth away" (Isa 29 5), 'passeth by transgression' (Mic 7 18); shūbh, "to go again" (Gen 43 2, etc); sāṭāh and ṣūr, "to go aside," occur several times with the meaning of wrongdoing (e.g. Nu 5 12; Dt 28 14, RV "turn aside"); nāsā', "to remove" (Ex 14 15), "Speak unto the children of Israel that they go forward" (ver 19 "removed"; Nu 2 24, etc); 'ăzal (Aram.), "to go away or about" (Ezr 4 23; Dnl 2 17, etc). Many other words occur only once or twice, e.g. 'āraḥ, "to travel" (Job 34 8); 'āshar, "to go straight or right" (Prov 4 14; 9 6, RV "walk"); dārakh, "to tread" (Isa 59 8); dādhāh, "to go softly" (Ps 42 4; Isa 38 15, RVm "as in solemn procession"); rāghal, "to stir," "to move," "I taught Ephraim to go" (Hos 11 3, RV "to walk").

The obsolete expression "go to" (derived from Tindale) is the tr of yāhabh in Gen 11 3.4.7; 38 16; Ex 1 10, "come on," RV "come"; of bō' (2 K 5 5 RV), "go now"; nā' (Jgs 7 3; Isa 5 5; Jer 18 11, omitted in RV).

2. In the NT

In the NT anabainō is "to go up" (Mt 3 16; 5 1, etc); erchomai, "to go on" (Mt 12 9, etc); aperchomai, "to go off or away" (Mt 2 22; 4 24, etc); poreuomai, "to go or pass on" (Mt 2 8.20, etc); hupagō, "to go away" (Mt 5 41; 8 32, etc). We have also other combinations with different shades of meaning, e.g. huperbaínō, "to go over or beyond" (1 Thess 4 6); eisérchomai, "to go into" (Mt 7 13; 15 11, etc); proporeúomai, "to go before" (Lk 1 76; Acts 7 40), and other forms; agō (ágōmen), "Let us go" (Mt 26 46; Jn 14 31, etc); áge is rendered "go to" (Jas 4 13; 5 1), RV "come."

"Go about [to]" AV is the tr of zētéō, "to seek," in Jn 7 19, "Why go ye about to kill me?" RV "Why seek ye?" and Rom 10 3; of peirázō, "to try," "attempt" (Acts 24 6, RV "assayed"), and of peiráomai (26 21, RV "assayed"), of epicheiréō "to lay hands on" (Acts 9 29), which remains in ERV unchanged, ARV "seeking"; "to let go" is the tr of apolúō, "to loose off" or "away" (Lk 14 4, etc), "to go astray," of planáō (Mt 18 12, etc).

Various other words occurring singly are tr^{d} by forms of "go," e.g. phérō, "to bear on," AV "Let us go on unto perfection" (He 6 1, see below); epidúō, "to go in upon," "Let not the sun go down upon your wrath" (Eph 4 26).

Among the many changes in RV are the following: For "go," Ex 4 26, "alone"; Lev 9 7, "draw near"; Nu 2 31, "set forth"; 16 46, "carry it"; Isa 11 15; 27 4, "march"; Mt 11 4; Jn 8 11, "Go your way"; Lk 17 7, "Come straightway"; 18 25, "enter in"; Jn 21 3*b*, "come." "Go" is substituted for "pass" (Ex 12 12), "came" (13 4), "away" (19 24), "be put" (Lev 6 12), "enter" (Job 34 23), "return" (Eccl 1 7), "come" (Mic 4 2; cf Zec 14 18*b*.19), "should be cast" (Mt 5 30); "if I go up" for "I will come up" (Ex 33 5); "make to go forth" for "bring forth" (Ps 37 6); "let them go" for "gave them up" (Ps 81 12). For the phrase, "go a whoring," ARV has "play the harlot" (Ex 34 15 f, etc, "commit fornication"); for "go about even now" (Dt 31 21, ARV), "frame this day"; for "go well" (Prov 30 29), "are stately in their march"; for "suffer us to go" (Mt 8 31), "send us" (a different text); for "not to think of men above that which is written" (1 Cor 4 6), "not [to go] beyond the things which are written"; for "that no man go beyond" (1 Thess 4 6), "transgress," m "overreach"; for "Let us go on unto perfection" (Heb 6 1), ERV "and press," ARV "Let us press on unto perfection."

GOAD, gōd (דָּרְבָן, dōr^{e}bhān, מַלְמָד, malmādh; κέντρον, kéntron): The goad used by the Syrian farmer is usually a straight branch of oak or other strong wood from which the bark has been stripped, and which has at one end a pointed spike and at the other a flat, chisel-shaped iron. The pointed end is to prod the oxen while plowing. The flattened iron at the other end is to scrape off the earth which clogs the ploughshare. The ancient goad was probably similar to this instrument. It could do villainous work in the hands of an experienced fighter (Jgs 3 31). If 1 S 13 21 is correctly tr^{d}, the goads were kept sharpened by files.

Figurative: "The words of the wise are as goads" (Eccl 12 11). The only reference to goads in the NT is the familiar passage, "It is hard for thee to kick against the goad" (Acts 26 14). It was as useless for Saul to keep on in the wrong way as for a fractious ox to attempt to leave the furrow. He would surely be brought back with a prick of the goad.

JAMES A. PATCH

GOAH, gō'a (גֹּעָה, gō'āh; AV GOATH, gō'ath; LXX reads ἐξ ἐκλεκτῶν λίθων, ex eklektōn líthōn): A place named in describing the boundaries of Jerus as restored in the "days to come" (Jer 31 39). If Gareb is the N.E. hill, then probably Goah is to be identified with the N.W. hill, which is called by Jos "the camp of the Assyrians" (BJ, V, vii, 3; xii, 2). See JERUSALEM.

GOAT, gōt: The common generic word for "goat" is עֵז, 'ēz (cf Arab. عَنْز, 'anz, "she-goat"; αἴξ, aíx), used often for "she-goat" (Gen 15 9; Nu 15 27), also with גְּדִי, g^{e}dhī, "kid," as גְּדִי עִזִּים, g^{e}dhī 'izzīm, "kid of the goats" (Gen 38 17), also with שָׂעִיר, sā'īr, "he-goat," as שְׂעִיר עִזִּים, s^{e}'īr 'izzīm, "kid of the goats" or "he-goat," or tr^{d} simply "kids," as in 1 K 20 27, "The children of Israel encamped before them like two little flocks of kids." Next frequently used is שָׂעִיר, sā'īr, lit. "hairy" (cf Arab. شَعْر, sha'r, "hair"; χήρ, chēr, "hedgehog"; Lat hircus, "goat"; hirtus, "hairy"; also Ger. Haar; Eng. "hair"), like 'ēz and 'attūdh used of goats for offerings. The goat which is sent into the wilderness bearing the sins of the people is sā'īr (Lev 16 7–22). The same name is used of devils (Lev 17 7; 2 Ch 11 15, RV "he-goats") and of satyrs (Isa 13 21; 34 14, RVm "he-goats," ARV "wild goats"). Cf also שְׂעִירַת עִזִּים, s^e'īrath 'izzīm, "a female from the flock" (Lev 4 28; 5 6). The male or leader of the flock is עַתּוּד, 'attūdh; Arab. 'atûd, "yearling he-goat"; fig. "chief ones" (Isa 14 9; cf Jer 50 8). A later word for "he-goat," used also figuratively, is צָפִיר, çāphīr (2 Ch 29 21; Ezr 8 35; Dnl 8 5.8.21). In Prov 30 31, one of the four things "which are stately in going" is the he-goat, תַּיִשׁ, tayish (Arab. تيس, tais, "he-goat"), also mentioned in Gen 30 35; 32 14 among the possessions of Laban and Jacob, and in 2 Ch 17 11 among the animals given as tribute by the Arabians to Jehoshaphat. In He 9 12.13.19; 10 4, we have τράγος, trágos, the ordinary Gr word for "goat"; in Mt 25 32.33, ἔριφος, ériphos, and its dim. ἐρίφιον, eríphion; in He 11 37 δέρμα αἴγειον, dérma aígeion, "goatskin," from aix (see supra). "Kid" is גְּדִי, g^edhī (cf En-gedi [1 S 23 29], etc), fem. גְּדִיָּה, g^edhīyāh (Cant 1 8), but also 'ēz, g^edhī 'izzīm, s^e'īr 'izzīm, s^e'īrath 'izzīm, b^enē 'izzīm, and ériphos. There remain יָעֵל, yā'ēl (1 S 24 2; Job 39 1; Ps 104 18), EV "wild goat"; יַעֲלָה, ya'ălāh (Prov 5 19), AV "roe," RV "doe"; אַקּוֹ, 'akkō (Dt 14 5), EV "wild goat"; and זֶמֶר, zemer (Dt 14 5), EV "chamois."

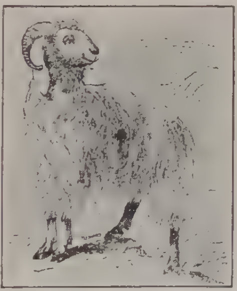
2. Wild Goats The original of our domestic goats is believed to be the Pers wild goat or pasang, Capra aegagrus, which inhabits some of the Gr islands, Asia Minor, Syria, Mesopotamia, Persia, Afghanistan, and Northwestern India. It is called wa'l (cf Heb yā'ēl) by the Arabs, who in the N. apply the same name to its near relative, the Sinaitic ibex, Capra beden. The last, doubtless the "wild goat" (yā'ēl) of the Bible, inhabits Southern Pal, Arabia, Sinai, and Eastern Egypt, and within its range is uniformly called beden by the Arabs. It is thought by the writer that the "chamois" (zemer) of Dt 14 5 may be the Pers wild goat. The word occurs only in this passage in the list of clean animals. See CHAMOIS; DEER; ZOÖLOGY. Wild goats are found only in Southern Europe, Southwestern Asia, and Northeastern Africa. They include the well-known, but now nearly extinct, Alpine ibex, steinbok, or bouquetin, the markhor, and the Himalayan ibex, which has enormous horns. The so-called Rocky Mountain goat is not properly a goat, but is an animal intermediate between goats and antelopes.



Wild Goat of Sinai.

3. Domestic Goats Domestic goats differ greatly among themselves in the color and length of their hair, in the size and shape of their ears, and in the size and shape of their horns, which are usually larger in the males, but in some breeds may be absent in both sexes. A very constant feature in both wild and domestic goats is the bearded chin of the male. The goats of Pal and Syria are usually black (Cant 4 1), though sometimes partly or entirely white or brown. Their hair is usually long, hanging down from their bodies. The horns are commonly curved outward and backward, but in one very handsome breed they extend nearly outward with slight but graceful curves, sometimes attaining a span of 2 ft. or more in the old males. The profile of the face is distinctly convex. They are herded in the largest numbers in the mountainous or hilly districts, and vie with their wild congeners in climbing into apparently impossible places. They feed not only on herbs, but also on shrubs and small trees, to which they are most destructive. They are largely responsible for the deforested condition of Judaea and Lebanon. They reach up the trees to the height of a man, holding themselves nearly or quite erect, and even walk out on low branches.

4. Economy Apart from the ancient use in sacrifice, which still survives among Moslems, goats are most valuable animals. Their flesh is eaten, and may be had when neither mutton nor beef can be found. Their milk is drunk and made into cheese and semn, a sort of clarified butter much used in cooking. Their hair is woven into tents (Cant 1 5), carpets, cloaks, sacks, slings, and various camel, horse and mule trappings. Their skins are made into bottles (nō'dh; Gr askós; Arab. kirbeh) for water, oil, semn, and other liquids (cf also He 11 37).

5. Religious and Figurative Just as the kid was often slaughtered for an honored guest (Jgs 6 19; 13 19), so the kid or goat was frequently taken for sacrifice (Lev 4 23; 9 15; 16 7; Nu 15 24; Ezr 8 35; Ezk 45 23; He 9 12). A goat was one of the clean animals (sēh 'izzīm, Dt 14 4). In Dnl, the powerful king out of the W. is typified as a goat with a single horn (8 5). One of the older goats is the leader of the flock. In some parts of the country the goatherd makes different ones leaders by turns, the leader being trained to keep near the goatherd and not to eat so long as he wears the bell. In Isa 14 9, ". . . . stirreth up the dead for thee, even all the chief ones of the earth," the word tr^d "chief ones" is 'attūdh, "he-goat." Again, in Jer 50 8, we have "Go forth out of the land of the Chaldeans, and be as the he-goats before the flocks." In Mt 25 32, in the scene of the last judgment, we find "He shall separate them one from another, as the shepherd separateth the sheep from the goats." It is not infrequent to find a flock including both goats and sheep grazing over the mountains, but they are usually folded separately.

ALFRED ELY DAY

GOATSKINS, gōt'skinz (ἐν αἰγείοις δέρμασιν, en aigeíois dérmasin): Such skins are mentioned only once (He 11 37), where the wearing of goatskins, indicating extreme poverty, is referred to, by implication, as the possible lot of the faithful Christian, even as it had been of others. Ascetics of different religions, esp. of the Moslem sects, are frequently seen going about Syria and Pal today, clad in sheepskins or goatskins, a sign of their renunciation of all things worldly.

GOATS' HAIR (עֵז, 'ēz): The word for she-goat is used elliptically to mean goats' hair, which was used in the tabernacle furnishings in the form of curtains (Ex 26 7; 36 14). Goats' hair was probably used in the Midianite and Israelitish camps in much the same way as in the Bedouin camps today (cf Nu 31 20). The tents, tent ropes and rugs are made of spun goats' hair. The provision sacks which hold wheat, rice, etc, and the saddlebags are made of the same material. A strip of the cloth rolled up furnishes a bolster for the head while sleeping (cf 1 S 19 13.16). Goats' hair cloth is admirably suited to stand the hard usage of a frequently shifting encampment. The children of Israel appreciated its utility, even for the tabernacle, where to the modern critical eye it would have looked out of place, matched against scarlet and fine linen (Ex 25 4; 35 6.26). The fact that goats' hair was used is good indication of the comparative crudeness of the tabernacle, when contrasted with present-day furnishings. See also HAIR; WEAVING. JAMES A. PATCH

GOB, gob (גֹּב, גּוֹב, gōbh): A place mentioned in 2 S 21 18 f as the scene of two of David's battles with the Philis. The name appears here only. In the ‖ passage, 1 Ch 20 4, it is called Gezer (cf Ant, VII, xii, 2). Certain texts read "Nob" for "Gob," while Syr and LXX read "Gath." The latter is probably correct.

GOBLET, gob′let (אַגָּן, 'aggān): A bowl or basin (Cant 7 2), the only place where the word is used. 'Aggān is used in the pl. in Ex 24 6 and Isa 22 24, and is trd. "basins" and "cups." These "basins" were used to hold the blood of the sacrifices and must have been of moderate size. The "cups" were bowl-shaped vessels and belonged evidently to the smaller class of vessels used in a house.

GOD, god (אֱלֹהִים, 'ĕlōhīm, אֵל, 'ēl, עֶלְיוֹן, 'elyōn, שַׁדַּי, shaddāy, יַהְוֶה, yahweh; θεός, theós):

I. Introduction to the General Idea.—Religion gives the idea of God, theology construes and organizes its content, and philosophy establishes its relation to the whole of man's experience.

1. The Idea in Experience and in Thought

The logical order of treating it might appear to be, first, to establish its truth by philosophical proofs; secondly, to develop its content into theological propositions; and finally, to observe its development and action in religion. Such has been the more usual order of treatment. But the actual history of the idea has been quite the reverse. Men had the idea of God, and it had proved a creative factor in history, long before reflection upon it issued in its systematic expression as a doctrine. Moreover, men had enunciated the doctrine before they attempted or even felt any need to define its relation to reality. And the logic of history is the truer philosophy. To arrive at the truth of any idea, man must begin with some portion of experience, define its content, relate it to the whole of experience, and so determine its degree of reality.

Religion is as universal as man, and every religion involves some idea of God. Of the various philosophical ideas of God, each has its counterpart and antecedent in some actual religion. Pantheism is the philosophy of the religious consciousness of India. Deism had prevailed for centuries as an actual attitude of men to God, in China, in Judaism and in Islam, before it found expression as a rational theory in the philosophy of the 18th cent. Theism is but the attempt to define in general terms the Christian conception of God, and of His relation to the world. If Pluralism claims a place among the systems of philosophy, it can appeal to the religious consciousness of that large portion of mankind that has hitherto adhered to Polytheism.

But all religions do not issue in speculative reconstructions of their content. It is true in a sense that all religion is an unconscious philosophy, because it is the reaction of the whole mind, including the intellect, upon the world of its experience, and, therefore, every idea of God involves some kind of an explanation of the world. But conscious reflection upon their own content emerges only in a few of the more highly developed religions. Brahmanism, Buddhism, Judaism, Islam and Christianity are the only religions that have produced great systems of thought, exhibiting their content in a speculative and rational form. The religions of Greece and Rome were unable to survive the reflective period. They produced no theology which could ally itself to a philosophy, and Gr philosophy was from the beginning to a great extent the denial and supersession of Gr religion.

Bib. lit. nearly all represents the spontaneous experience of religion, and contains comparatively little reflection upon that experience. In the OT it is only in Isa 40–66, in the Wisdom literature and in a few Pss that the human mind may be seen turning back upon itself to ask the meaning of its practical feelings and beliefs. Even here nothing appears of the nature of a philosophy of Theism or of religion, no theology, no organic definition and no ideal reconstruction of the idea of God. It never occurred to any OT writer to offer a proof of the existence of God, or that anyone should need it. Their concern was to bring men to a right relation with God, and they propounded right views of God only in so far as it was necessary for their practical purpose. Even the fool who "hath said in his heart, There is no God" (Ps 14 1; 53 1), and the wicked nations "that forget God" (Ps 9 17) are no theoretical atheists, but wicked and corrupt men, who, in conduct and life, neglect or reject the presence of God.

The NT contains more theology, more reflection upon the inward content of the idea of God, and upon its cosmic significance; but here also, no system appears, no coherent and rounded-off doctrine, still less any philosophical construction of the idea on the basis of experience as a whole. The task of exhibiting the Bib. idea of God is, therefore, not that of setting together a number of texts, or of writing the history of a theology, but rather of interpreting the central factor in the life of the Heb and Christian communities.

2. Definition of the Idea of God

Logically and historically the Bib. idea stands related to a number of other ideas. Attempts have been made to find a definition of so general a nature as to comprehend them all. The older theologians assumed the Christian standpoint, and put into their definitions the conclusions of Christian doctrine and philosophy. Thus Melanchthon: "God is a spiritual essence, intelligent, eternal, true, good, pure, just, merciful, most free and of infinite power and wisdom." Thomasius more briefly defines God as "the absolute personality." These definitions take no account of the existence of lower religions and ideas of God, nor do they convey much of the concreteness and nearness of God revealed in Christ. A similar recent definition, put forward, however, avowedly of the Christian conception, is that of Professor W. N. Clarke: "God is the personal Spirit, perfectly good, who in holy love creates, sustains and orders all" (Outline of Christian Theology, 66). The rise of comparative religion has shown that "while all religions involve a conscious relation to a being called God, the Divine Being is in different religions conceived in the most different ways; as one and as many, as natural and as spiritual, as like to and manifested in almost every object in the heavens above or earth beneath, in mountains and trees, in animals and men; or, on the contrary, as being incapable of being represented by any finite image whatsoever; and, again, as the God of a family, of a nation, or of humanity" (E. Caird, Evolution of Religion, I, 62). Attempts have therefore been made to find a new kind of definition, such as would include under one category all the ideas of God possessed by the human race. A typical instance of this kind of definition is that of Professor W. Adams Brown: "A god in the religious sense is an unseen being, real or supposed, to whom an individual or a social group is united by voluntary ties of reverence and service" (Christian Theology in Outline, 30). Many similar definitions are given: "A supersensible being or beings" (Lotze, A. M. Fairbairn); "a higher power" (Allan Menzies); "spiritual beings" (E. B. Tylor); "a power not ourselves making for righteousness" (Matthew Arnold). This class of definition suffers from a twofold defect. It says too much to include the ideas of the lower religions, and too little to suggest those of the higher. It is not all gods that are "unseen" or "supersensible," or "making for righteousness," but all these qualities may be shared by other beings than gods, and they do not connote that which is essential in the higher ideas of God. Dr. E. Caird, looking for a definition in a germinative principle of the genesis of religion, defines God "as the unity which is presupposed in the difference of the self and not-self, and within which they act and re-act on each other" (op. cit., I, 40, 64). This principle admittedly finds its full realization only in the highest religion, and it may be doubted whether it does justice to the transcendent personality and the love of God as revealed in Jesus Christ. In the lower religions it appears only in fragmentary forms, and it can only be detected in them at all after it has been revealed in the absolute religion. Although this definition may be neither adequate nor true, its method recognizes that there can be only one true idea and definition of God, and yet that all other ideas are more or less true elements of it and approximations to it. The Bib. idea does not stand alone like an island in mid-ocean, but is rather the center of light which radiates out in other religions with varying degrees of purity.

It is not the purpose of this article to deal with the problem of the philosophy of religion, but to give an account of the idea of God at certain stages of its development, and within a limited area of thought. The absence of a final definition will present no practical difficulty, because the denotation of the term God is clear enough; it includes everything that is or has been an object of worship; it is its connotation that remains a problem for speculation.

3. The Knowledge of God

A third class of definition demands some attention, because it raises a new question, that of the knowledge or truth of any idea whatsoever. Herbert Spencer's definition may be taken as representative: God is the unknown and unknowable cause of the universe, "an inscrutable power manifested to us through all phenomena" (First Principles, V, 31). This means that there can be no definition of the idea of God, because we can have no idea of Him, no knowledge "in the strict sense of knowing." For the present purpose it might suffice for an answer that ideas of God actually exist; that they can be defined and are more definable, because fuller and more complex, the higher they rise in the scale of religions; that they can be gathered from the folklore and traditions of the lower races, and from the sacred books and creeds of the higher religions. But Spencer's view means that, in so far as the ideas are definable, they are not true. The more we define, the more fictitious becomes our subject-matter. While nothing is more certain than that God exists, His being is to human thought utterly mysterious and inscrutable. The variety of ideas might seem to support this view. But variety of ideas has been held of every subject that is known, as witness the progress of science. The variety proves nothing.

And the complete abstraction of thought from existence cannot be maintained. Spencer himself does not succeed in doing it. He says a great many things about the "unknowable" which implies an extensive knowledge of Him. The traditional proofs of the "existence" of God have misled the Agnostics. But existence is meaningless except for thought, and a noumenon or first cause that lies hidden in impenetrable mystery behind phenomena cannot be conceived even as a fiction. Spencer's idea of the Infinite and Absolute are contradictory and unthinkable. An Infinite that stood outside all that is known would not be infinite, and an Absolute out of all relation could not even be imagined. If there is any truth at all in the idea of the Absolute, it must be true to human experience and thought; and the true Infinite must include within itself every possible and actual perfection. In truth, every idea of God that has lived in religion refutes Agnosticism, because they all qualify and interpret experience, and the only question is as to the degree of their adequacy and truth.

A brief enumeration of the leading ideas of God that have lived in religion will serve to place the Bib. idea in its true perspective.

4. Ethnic Ideas of God

(1) Animism is the name of a theory which explains the lowest (and perhaps the earliest) forms of religion, and also the principle of all religion, as the belief in the universal presence of spiritual beings which "are held to affect or control the events of the material world, and man's life here and hereafter; and, it being considered that they hold intercourse with men, and receive pleasure or displeasure from human actions, the belief in their existence leads naturally, and, it might almost be said, inevitably, sooner or later, to active reverence and propitiation" (E. B. Tylor, Primitive Culture, I, 426–27). According to this view, the world is full of disembodied spirits, regarded as similar to man's soul, and any or all of these may be treated as gods.

(2) Fetichism is sometimes used in a general sense for "the view that the fruits of the earth and things in general are divine, or animated by powerful spirits" (J. G. Frazer, Adonis, Attis, Osiris, 234); or it may be used in a more particular sense of the belief that spirits "take up their abode, either temporarily or permanently, in some object, ... and this object, as endowed with higher power, is then worshipped" (Tiele, Outlines of the History of Religion, 9).

(3) Idolatry is a term of still more definite significance. It means that the object is at least selected, as being the permanent habitation or symbol of the deity; and, generally, it is marked by some degree of human workmanship, designed to enable it the more adequately to represent the deity. It is not to be supposed that men ever worship mere "stocks and stones," but they address their worship to objects, whether fetiches or idols, as being the abodes or images of their god. It is a natural and common idea that the spirit has a form similar to the visible object in which it dwells. Paul reflected the heathen idea accurately when he said, "We ought not to think that the Godhead is like unto gold, or silver, or stone, graven by art and device of man" (Acts 17 29).

(4) Polytheism.—The belief in many gods, and the worship of them, is an attitude of soul compatible with Animism, Fetichism and Idolatry, or it may be independent of them all. The term Polytheism is more usually employed to designate the worship of a limited number of well-defined deities, whether regarded as pure disembodied spirits, or as residing in the greater objects of Nature, such as planets or mountains, or as symbolized by images "graven by art and device of man." In ancient Greece or modern India the great gods are well defined, named and numerable, and it is clearly understood that, though they may be symbolized by images, they dwell apart in a spiritual realm above the rest of the world.

(5) Henotheism.—There is, however, a tendency, both in individuals and in communities, even where many gods are believed to exist, to set one god above the others, and consequently to confine worship to that god alone. "The monotheistic tendency exists among all peoples, after they have reached a certain level of culture. There is a difference in the degree in which this tendency is emphasized, but whether we turn to Babylonia, Egypt, India, China, or Greece, there are distinct traces of a trend toward concentrating the varied manifestations of Divine powers in a single source" (Jastrow, The Study of Religion, 76). This attitude of mind has been called Henotheism or Monolatry—the worship of one God combined with the belief in the existence of many. This tendency may be governed by metaphysical, or by ethical and personal motives, either by the monistic demands of reason, or by personal attachment to one political or moral rule.

(6) Pantheism.—Where the former principle predominates, Polytheism merges into Pantheism, as is the case in India, where Brahma is not only the supreme, but the sole, being, and all other gods are but forms of his manifestation. But, in India, the vanquished gods have had a very complete revenge upon their vanquisher, for Brahma has become so abstract and remote that worship is mainly given to the other gods, who are forms of his manifestation. Monolatry has been reversed, and modern Hinduism were better described as the belief in one God accompanied by the worship of many.

(7) Deism.—The monistic tendency, by a less thorough application of it, may take the opposite turn toward Deism, and yet produce similar religious conditions. The Supreme Being, who is the ultimate reality and power of the universe, may be conceived in so vague and abstract a manner, may be so remote from the world, that it becomes a practical necessity to interpose between Him and men a number of subordinate and nearer beings as objects of worship. In ancient Greece, Necessity, in China, Tien or Heaven, were the Supreme Beings; but a multiplicity of lower gods were the actual objects of worship. The angels of Zoroastrianism, Judaism and Islam and the saints of Romanism illustrate the same tendency. Pantheism and Deism, though they have had considerable vogue as philosophical theories, have proved unstable and impossible as religions, for they have invariably reverted to some kind of polytheism and idolatry, which seems to indicate that they are false processes of the monistic tendency.

(8) Semitic monolatry.—The monistic tendency of reason may enlist in its aid many minor causes, such as tribal isolation or national aggrandizement. It is held that many Sem tribes were monolatrists for either or both of these reasons; but the exigencies of intertribal relations in war and commerce soon neutralized their effects, and merged the tribal gods into a territorial pantheon.

(9) Monotheism, ethical and personal: One further principle may combine with Monism so as to bring about a stable Monotheism, that is the conception of God as standing in moral relations with man. Whenever man reflects upon conduct as moral, he recognizes that there can be only one moral standard and authority, and when God is identified with that moral authority, He inevitably comes to be recognized as supreme and unique. The belief in the existence of other beings called gods may survive for a while; but they are divested of all the attributes of deity when they are seen to be inferior or opposed to the God who rules in conscience. Not only are they not worshipped, but their worship by others comes to be regarded as immoral and wicked. The ethical factor in the monistic conception of God safeguards it from diverging into Pantheism or Deism and thus reverting into Polytheism. For the ethical idea of God necessarily involves His personality, His transcendence as distinct from the world and above it, and also His intimate and permanent relation with man. If He rules in conscience, He can neither be merged in dead nature or abstract being, nor be removed beyond the heavens and the angel host. A thoroughly moralized conception of God emerges first in the OT where it is the prevailing type of thought.

II. The Idea of God in the OT.

—Any attempt to write the whole history of the idea of God in the OT would require a preliminary study of the literary and historical character of the documents, which lies beyond the scope of this article and the province of the writer. Yet the OT contains no systematic statement of the doctrine of God, or even a series of statements that need only to be collected into a consistent conception. The OT is the record of a rich and varied life, extending over more than a thousand years, and the ideas that ruled and inspired that life must be largely inferred from the deeds and institutions in which it was realized; nor was it stationary or all at one level. Nothing is more obvious than that revelation in the OT has been progressive, and that the idea of God it conveys has undergone a development. Certain well-marked stages of the development can be easily recognized, without entering upon any detailed criticism. There can be no serious question that the age of the Exodus, as centering around the personality of Moses, witnessed an important new departure in Heb religion. The most ancient traditions declare (perhaps not unanimously) that God was then first known to Israel under the personal name Jehovah (Yahweh [YHWH] is the correct form of the word, Jehovah being composite of the consonants of Yahweh and the vowels of 'ădhōnāy, or lord. Jeh is retained here as the more familiar form). The Heb people came to regard Him as their Deliverer from Egypt, as their war god who assured them the conquest of Canaan, and He, therefore, became their king, who ruled over their destinies in their new heritage. But the settlement of Jeh in Canaan, like that of His people, was challenged by the native gods and their peoples. In the 9th cent. we see the war against Jeh carried into His own camp, and Baal-worship attempting to set itself up within Israel. His prophets therefore assert the sole right of Jeh to the worship of His people, and the great prophets of the 8th cent. base that right upon His moral transcendence. Thus they at once reveal new depths of His moral nature, and set His uniqueness and supremacy on higher grounds. During the exile and afterward, Israel's outlook broadens by contact with the greater world, and it draws out the logical implications of ethical monotheism into a theology at once more universalistic and abstract. Three fairly well-defined periods thus emerge, corresponding to three stages in the development of the OT idea of God: the pre-prophetic period governed by the Mosaic conception, the prophetic period during which ethical monotheism is firmly established, and the post-exilic period with the rise of abstract monotheism. But even in taking these large and obvious divisions, it is necessary to bear in mind the philosopher's maxim, that "things are not cut off with a hatchet." The most characteristic ideas of each period may be described within their period; but it should not be assumed that they are altogether absent from other periods; and, in particular, it should not be supposed that ideas, and the life they represent, did not exist before they emerged in the clear witness of history. Mosaism had undoubtedly its antecedents in the life of Israel; but any attempt to define them leads straight into a very morass of conjectures and hypotheses, archaeological, critical and philosophical; and any results that are thus obtained are contributions to comparative religion rather than to theology.

1. Course of Its Development

2. Forms of the Manifestation of God

Religious experience must always have had an inward and subjective aspect, but it is a long and difficult process to translate the objective language of ordinary life for the uses of subjective experience. "Men look outward before they look inward." Hence we find that men express their consciousness of God in the earliest periods in language borrowed from the visible and objective world. It does not follow that they thought of God in a sensuous way, because they speak of Him in the language of the senses, which alone was available for them. On the other hand, thought is never entirely independent of language, and the degree in which men using sensuous language may think of spiritual facts varies with different persons.

(1) The face or countenance (pānīm) of God is a natural expression for His presence. The place where God is seen is called Peniel, the face of God (Gen 32 30). The face of Jeh is His people's blessing (Nu 6 25). With His face (RV "presence") He brought Israel out of Egypt, and His face (RV "presence") goes with them to Canaan (Ex 33 14). To be alienated from God is to be hid from His face (Gen 4 14), or God hides His face (Dt 31 17.18; 32 20). In contrast with this idea it is said elsewhere that man cannot see the face of God and live (Ex 33 20; cf Dt 5 24; Jgs 6 22; 13 22). In these later passages, "face" stands for the entire being of God, as distinguished from what man may know of Him. This phrase and its cognates enshrine also that fear of God, which shrinks from His majesty even while approaching Him, which enters into all worship.

(2) The voice (ḳōl) and word (dābhār) of God are forms under which His communion with man is conceived from the earliest days to the latest. The idea ranges from that of inarticulate utterance (1 K 19 12) to the declaration of the entire law of conduct (Dt 5 22–24), to the message of the prophet (Isa 2 1; Jer 1 2), and the personification of the whole counsel and action of God (Ps 105 19; 147 18.19; Hos 6 5; Isa 40 8).

(3) The glory (kābhōdh) of God is both a peculiar physical phenomenon and the manifestation of God in His works and providence. In certain passages in Ex, ascribed to the PC, the glory is a bright light, "like devouring fire" (24 17); it fills and consecrates the tabernacle (29 43; 40 34.35); and it is reflected as beams of light in the face of Moses (34 29). In Ezk, it is a frequent term for the prophet's vision, a brightness like the appearance of a rainbow (1 28; 10 4; 43 2). In another place, it is identified with all the manifested goodness of God, and is accompanied with the proclamation of His name (Ex 33 17–23). Two passages in Isa seem to combine under this term the idea of a physical manifestation with that of God's effectual presence in the world (3 8; 6 3). God's presence in creation and history is often expressed in the Pss as His glory (19 1; 57 5.11; 63 2; 97 6). Many scholars hold that the idea is found in Isa in its earliest form, and that the physical meaning is quite late. It would, however, be contrary to all analogy, if such phenomena as rainbow and lightning had not first impressed the primitive mind as manifestations of God. See Glory.

(4) The angel (mal'ākh) of God or of Jeh is a frequent mode of God's manifestation of Himself in human form, and for occasional purposes. It is a primitive conception, and its exact relation to God, or its likeness to man, is nowhere fixed. In many passages, it is assumed that God and His angel are the same being, and the names are used synonymously (as in Gen 16 7 ff; 22 15.16; Ex 3 2.4; Jgs 2 4.5); in other passages the idea blurs into varying degrees of differentiation (Gen 18; 24 40; Ex 23 21; 33 2.3; Jgs 13 8.9). But everywhere, it fully represents God as speaking or acting for the time being; and it is to be distinguished from the subordinate and intermediate beings of later angelology. Its identification with the Messiah and the Logos is only true in the sense that these later terms are more definite expressions of the idea of revelation, which the angel represented for primitive thought.

(5) The spirit (rūᵃḥ) of God in the earlier period is a form of His activity, as it moves warrior and prophet to act and to speak (Jgs 6 34; 13 25; 1 S 10 10), and it is in the prophetic period that it becomes the organ of the communication of God's thoughts to men. See Holy Spirit.

(6) The name (shēm) of God is the most comprehensive and frequent expression in the OT for His self-manifestation, for His person as it may be known to men. The name is something visible or audible which represents God to men, and which, therefore, may be said to do His deeds, and to stand in His place, in relation to men. God reveals Himself by making known or proclaiming His name (Ex 6 3; 33 19; 34 5.6). His servants derive their authority from His name (Ex 3 13.15; 1 S 17 45). To worship God is to call upon His name (Gen 12 8; 13 4; 21 33; 26 25; 1 K 18 24–26), to fear it (Dt 28 58), to praise it (2 S 22 50; Ps 7 17; 54 6), to glorify it (Ps 86 9). It is wickedness to take God's name in vain (Ex 20 7), or to profane and blaspheme it (Lev 8 21; 24 16). God's dwelling-place is the place where He chooses "to cause his name to dwell" (2 S 7 13; 1 K 3 2; 5 3.5; 8 16–19; 18 32; Dt 12 11.21). God's name defends His people (Ps 20 1; Isa 30 27). For His name's sake He will not forsake them (1 S 12 22), and if they perish, His name cannot remain (Josh 7 9). God is known by different names, as expressing various forms of His self-manifestation (Gen 16 13; 17 1; Ex 3 6; 34 6). The name even confers its revelation-value upon the angel (Ex 23 20–23). All God’s names are, therefore, significant for the revelation of His being.

(7) Occasional forms.—In addition to these more or less fixed forms, God also appears in a variety of exceptional or occasional forms. In Nu 12 6–8, it is said that Moses, unlike others, used to see the form (t^{e}mūnāh) of Jeh. Fire, smoke and cloud are frequent forms or symbols of God’s presence (e.g. Gen 15 17; Ex 3 2–4; 19 18; 24 17), and notably “the pillar of cloud by day, and the pillar of fire by night” (Ex 13 21 f). According to later ideas, the cloud rested upon the tabernacle (Ex 40 34), and in it God appeared upon the ark (Lev 16 2). Extraordinary occurrences or miracles are, in the early period, frequent signs of the power of God (Ex 7 ff; 1 K 17 ff).

The questions of the objectivity of any or all of these forms, and of their relation to the whole Divine essence raise large problems. OT thought had advanced beyond the naïve identification of God with natural phenomena, but we should not read into its figurative language the metaphysical distinctions of a Gr-Christian theology.

3. The Names of God

All the names of God were originally significant of His character, but the derivations, and therefore the original meanings, of several have been lost, and new meanings have been sought for them.

(1) Generic names.—One of the oldest and most widely distributed terms for Deity known to the human race is ’Ēl, with its derivations ’Ēlīm, ’Ĕlōhīm and ’Ĕlō^{a}h. Like theos, Deus and God, it is a generic term, including every member of the class deity. It may even denote a position of honor and authority among men. Moses was ’Ĕlōhīm to Pharaoh (Ex 7 1) and to Aaron (Ex 4 16; cf Jgs 5 8; 1 S 2 25; Ex 21 5.6; 22 7 ff; Ps 58 11; 82 1). It is, therefore, a general term expressing majesty and authority, and it only came to be used as a proper name for Israel’s God in the later period of abstract monotheism when the old proper name Jeh was held to be too sacred to be uttered. The meaning of the root ’Ēl, and the exact relation to it, and to one another, of ’Ĕlōhīm and ’Ĕlō^{a}h, lie in complete obscurity. By far the most frequent form used by OT writers is the pl. ’Ĕlōhīm, but they use it regularly with sing. vbs. and adjs. to denote a singular idea. Several explanations have been offered of this usage of a pl. term to denote a sing. idea—that it expresses the fulness and manifoldness of the Divine nature, or that it is a pl. of majesty used in the manner of royal persons, or even that it is an early intimation of the Trinity; other cognate expressions are found in Gen 1 26; 3 22; 1 K 22 19 f; Isa 6 8. These theories are, perhaps, too ingenious to have occurred to the early Heb mind, and a more likely explanation is, that they are survivals in language of a polytheistic stage of thought. In the OT they signify only the general notion of Deity.

(2) Attributive names.—To distinguish the God of Israel as supreme from others of the class ’Ĕlōhīm, certain qualifying appellations are often added. ’Ēl ‘Elyōn designates the God of Israel as the highest, the most high, among the ’Ĕlōhīm (Gen 14 18–20); so do Jeh ‘Elyōn (Ps 7 17) and ‘Elyōn alone, often in Pss and in Isa 14 14.

’Ēl Shaddāy, or Shaddāy alone, is a similar term which on the strength of some tradition is tr^{d} “God Almighty”; but its derivation and meaning are quite unknown. According to Ex 6 3 it was the usual name for God in patriarchal times, but other traditions in the Pent seem to have no knowledge of this.

Another way of designating God was by His relation to His worshippers, as God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob (Gen 24 12; Ex 3 6), of Shem (Gen 9 26), of the Hebrews (Ex 3 18), and of Israel (Gen 33 20).

Other names used to express the power and majesty of God are çūr, “Rock” (Dt 32 18; Isa 30 29), ’ăbhīr (cstr fr ’ābhīr), “the Strong One” (Gen 49 24; Isa 1 24; Ps 132 2); melekh, “King”; ’ādhōn, “lord,” and ’ădhōnāy, “my lord” (Ex 23 17; Isa 10 16.33; Gen 18 27; Isa 6 1). Also ba‘al, “proprietor” or “master,” may be inferred as a designation once in use, from its appearance in such Heb proper names as Jerubbaal and Ishbaal. The last three names describe God as a Master to whom man stands in the relation of a servant, and they tended to fall into disuse as the necessity arose to differentiate the worship of Jeh from that of the gods of surrounding nations.

A term of uncertain meaning is Yahweh or ’Ĕlōhīm ç^{e}bhā’ōth, “Jeh” or “God of hosts.” In Heb usage “host” might mean an army of men, or the stars and the angels—which, apart or in conjunction, made up the host of heaven. God of Hosts in early times meant the war god who led the armies of Israel (1 S 4 4; 2 S 7 8). In 1 S 17 45 this title stands in parallelism with “the God of the armies of Israel.” So all Israel is called the host of Jeh (Ex 12 41). In the Prophets, where the term has become a regular appellation, it stands in relation to every form of the power and majesty, physical and moral, of God (e.g. Isa 2 12; 6 3.5; 10 23.33). It stands in parallelism with Isaiah’s peculiar title, the Holy One of Israel (Isa 5 16.24). It has, therefore, been thought that it refers to the host of heaven. In the Prophets it is practically a proper name. Its original meaning may well have been forgotten or dropped, but it does not follow that a new special significance was attached to the word “hosts.” The general meaning of the whole term is well expressed by the LXX tr, kúrios pantokrátōr, “Lord Omnipotent.”

(3) Jehovah (Yahweh).—This is the personal proper name par excellence of Israel’s God, even as Chemosh was that of the god of Moab, and Dagon that of the god of the Philis. The original meaning and derivation of the word are unknown. The variety of modern theories shows that, etymologically, several derivations are possible, but that the meanings attached to any one of them have to be imported and imposed upon the word. They add nothing to our knowledge. The Hebrews themselves connected the word with hāyāh, “to be.” In Ex 3 14 Jeh is explained as equivalent to ’ehyeh, which is a short form of ’ehyeh ’ăsher ’ehyeh, tr^{d} in RV “I am that I am.” This has been supposed to mean “self-existence,” and to represent God as the Absolute. Such an idea, however, would be a metaphysical abstraction, not only impossible to the time at which the name originated, but alien to the Heb mind at any time. And the imperfect ’ehyeh is more accurately tr^{d} “I will be what I will be,” a Sem idiom meaning, “I will be all that is necessary as the occasion will arise,” a familiar OT idea (cf Isa 7 4.9; Ps 23).

This name was in use from the earliest historical times till after the exile. It is found in the most ancient lit. According to Ex 3 13 f, and esp. 6 2.3, it was first introduced by Moses, and was the medium of a new revelation of the God of their fathers to the children of Israel. But in parts of Gen it is represented as being in use from the earliest times. Theories that derive it from Egypt or Assyria, or that would connect it etymologically with Jove or Zeus, are supported by no evidence. We have to be content either to say that Jeh was the tribal God of Israel from time immemorial, or to accept a theory that is practically identical with that of Ex—that it was adopted through Moses from the Midianite tribe into which he married. The Kenites, the tribe of Midianites related to Moses, dwelt in the neighborhood of Sinai, and attached themselves to Israel (Jgs 1 16; 4 11). A few passages suggest that Sinai was the original home of Jeh (Jgs 5 4.5; Dt 33 2). But there is no direct evidence bearing upon the origin of the worship of Jeh: to us He is known only as the God of Israel.

4. Pre-prophetic Conceptions of Jeh

(1) Jeh alone was the God of Israel.—Heb theology consists essentially of the doctrine of Jeh and its implications. The teachers and leaders of the people at all times worship and enjoin the worship of Jeh alone. "It stands out as a prominent and incontrovertible fact, that down to the reign of Ahab . . . . no prominent man in Israel, with the doubtful exception of Solomon, known by name and held up for condemnation, worshipped any other god but Yahveh. In every national and tribal crisis, in all times of danger and of war, it is Yahveh and Yahveh alone who is invoked to give victory and deliverance" (Montefiore, Hibbert Lectures^{3}, 21). This is more evident in what is, without doubt, very early lit., even than in later writings (e.g. Jgs 5; Dt 33; 1 S 4–6). The isolation of the desert was more favorable to the integrity of Jeh's sole worship than the neighborhood of powerful peoples who worshipped many other gods. Yet that early religion of Jeh can be called monotheistic only in the light of the end it realized, for in the course of its development it had to overcome many limitations.

(a) The early worship of Jeh did not exclude belief in the existence of other gods. As other nations believed in the existence of Jeh (1 S 4 8; 2 K 17 27), so Israel did not doubt the reality of other gods (Jgs 11 24; Nu 21 29; Mic 4 5). This limitation involved two others: Jeh is the God of Israel only; with them alone He makes a COVENANT (q.v.) (Gen 15 18; Ex 6 4.5; 2 K 17 34.35), and their worship only He seeks (Dt 4 32–37; 32 9; Am 3 2). Therefore He works, and can be worshipped only within a certain geographical area. He may have been associated with His original home in Sinai long after the settlement in Canaan (Jgs 5 4; Dt 33 2; 1 K 19 8.9), but gradually His home and that of His people became identical (1 S 26 19; Hos 9 3; Isa 14 2.25). Even after the deportation of the ten tribes, Canaan remains Jeh's land (2 K 17 24–28). Early Israelites are, therefore, more properly described as Monolatrists or Henotheists than as Monotheists. It is characteristic of the religion of Israel (in contrast with, e.g. Gr thought) that it arrived at absolute Monotheism along the line of moral and religious experience, rather than that of rational inference. Even while they shared the common Sem belief in the reality of other gods, Jeh alone had for them "the value of God."

(b) It is necessary to distinguish between the teaching of the religious leaders and the belief and practice of the people generally. The presence of a higher religion never wholly excludes superstitious practices. The use of Teraphim (Gen 31 30; 1 S 19 13.16; Hos 3 4), Ephod (Jgs 18 17–20; 1 S 23 6.9; 30 7), Urim and Thummim (1 S 28 6; 14 40, LXX), for the purposes of magic and divination, to obtain oracles from Jeh, was quite common in Israel. Necromancy was practised early and late (1 S 28 7 ff; Isa 8 19; Dt 18 10.11). Sorcery and witchcraft were not unknown, but were condemned by the religious leaders (1 S 28 3). The burial places of ancestors were held in great veneration (Gen 35 20; 50 13; Josh 24 30). But these facts do not prove that Heb religion was animistic and polytheistic, any more than similar phenomena in Christian lands would justify such an inference about Christianity.

(c) Yet the worship of Jeh maintained and developed its monotheistic principle only by overcoming several hostile tendencies. The Baal-worship of the Canaanites and the cults of other neighboring tribes proved a strong attraction to the mass of Israelites (Jgs 2 13; 3 7; 8 33; 10 10; 1 S 8 8; 12 10; 1 K 11 5.33; Hos 2 5.17; Ezk 20; Ex 20 5; 22 20; 34 16.17). Under the conditions of life in Canaan, the sole worship of Jeh was in danger of modification by three tendencies, coördination, assimilation and disintegration.

(i) When the people had settled down in peaceful relations with their neighbors, and began to have commercial and diplomatic transactions with them, it was inevitable that they should render their neighbor's gods some degree of reverence and worship. Courtesy and friendship demanded as much (cf 2 K 5 18). When Solomon had contracted many foreign alliances by marriage, he was also bound to admit foreign worship into Jerus (1 K 11 5). But Ahab was the first king who tried to set up the worship of Baal, side by side with that of Jeh, as the national religion (1 K 18 19). Elijah's stand and Jehu's revolution gave its death blow to Baal-worship and vindicated the sole right of Jeh to Israel's allegiance. The prophet was defending the old religion and Ahab was the innovator; but the conflict and its issue brought the monotheistic principle to a new and higher level. The supreme temptation and the choice transformed what had been a natural monolatry into a conscious and moral adherence to Jeh alone (1 K 18 21.39).

(ii) But to repudiate the name of Baal was not necessarily to be rid of the influence of Baal-worship. The ideas of the heathen religions survived in a more subtle way in the worship of Jeh Himself. The change from the nomad life of the desert to the agricultural conditions of Canaan involved some change in religion. Jeh, the God of flocks and wars, must now be recognized as the God of the vintage and the harvest. That this development occurred is manifest in the character of the great religious festivals. "Three times thou shalt keep a feast unto me in the year. The feast of unleavened bread shalt thou keep . . . . and the feast of harvest, the first-fruits of thy labors, which thou sowest in the field: and the feast of ingathering, at the end of the year, when thou gatherest in thy labors out of the field" (Ex 23 14–16). The second and the third obviously, and the first probably, were agricultural feasts, which could have no meaning in the desert. Israel and Jeh together took possession of Canaan. To doubt that would be to admit the claims of the Baal-worship; but to assert it also involved some danger, because it was to assert certain similarities between Jeh and the Baalim. When those similarities were embodied in the national festivals, they loomed very large in the eyes and minds of the mass of the people (W. R. Smith, Prophets of Israel, 49–57). The danger was that Israel should regard Jeh, like the Baals of the country, as a Nature-god, and, by local necessity, a national god, who gave His people the produce of the land and protected them from their enemies, and in return received from them such gifts and sacrifices as corresponded to His nature. From the appearance in Israel, and among Jeh worshippers, of such names as Jerubbaal, Esh-baal (son of Saul) and Beeliada (son of David, 1 Ch 14 7), it has been inferred that Jeh was called Baal, and there is ample evidence that His worship was assimilated to that of the Canaanite Baalim. The bulls raised by Jeroboam (1 K 12 26 ff) were symbols of Jeh, and in Judah the Canaanite worship was imitated down to the time of Asa (1 K 14 22–24; 15 12.13). Against this tendency above all, the great prophets of the 8th cent. contended. Israel worshipped Jeh as if He were one of the Baalim, and Hosea calls it Baal-worship (Hos 2 8.12.13; cf Am 2 8; Isa 1 10–15).

(iii) And where Jeh was conceived as one of the Baalim or Masters of the land, He became, like them, subject to disintegration into a number of local deities. This was probably the gravamen of Jeroboam's sin in the eyes of the "Deuteronomic" historian. In setting up separate sanctuaries, he divided the worship, and, in effect, the godhead of Jeh. The localization and naturalization of Jeh, as well as His assimilation to the Baals, all went together, so that we read that even in Judah the number of gods was according to its cities (Jer 2 28; 11 13). The vindication of Jeh's moral supremacy and spiritual unity demanded, among other things, the unification of His worship in Jerus (2 K 23).

(d) In one respect the religion of Jeh successfully resisted the influence of the heathen cults. At no time was Jeh associated with a goddess. Although the corrupt sensual practices that formed a large part of heathen worship also entered into Israel's worship (see Asherah), it never penetrated so far as to modify in this respect the idea of Jeh.

(e) It is a difficult question how far human sacrifices at any time found place in the worship of Jeh. The outstanding instance is that of Jephthah's daughter, which, though not condemned, is certainly regarded as exceptional (Jgs 11 30–40). Perhaps it is rightly regarded as a unique "survival." Then the story of the sacrifice of Isaac, while reminiscent of an older practice, represents a more advanced view. Human sacrifice, though not demanded, is not abhorrent to Jeh (Gen 22). A further stage is represented where Ahaz' sacrifice of his son is condemned as an "abomination of the nations" (2 K 16 3). The sacrifice of children is emphatically condemned by the prophets as a late and foreign innovation which Jeh had not commanded (Jer 7 31; Ezk 16 20). Other cases, such as the execution of the chiefs of Shittim (Nu 25 4), and of Saul's sons "before Jeh" (2 S 21 9), and the ḥērem or ban, by which whole communities were devoted to destruction (Jgs 21 10; 1 S 15), while they show a very inadequate idea of the sacredness of human life, are not sacrifices, nor were they demanded by Jeh's worship. They were survivals of savage customs connected with tribal unity, which the higher morality of Jeh's religion had not yet abolished.

(2) The nature and character of Jeh are manifested in His activities. The OT makes no statements about the essence of God; we are left to infer it from His action in Nature and history and from His dealing with man.

(a) In this period, His activity is predominantly martial. As Israel's Deliverer from Egypt, "Jeh is a man of war" (Ex 15 3). An ancient account of Israel's journey to Canaan is called "the book of the Wars of Jeh" (Nu 21 14). By conquest in war He gave His people their land (Jgs 5; 2 S 5 24; Dt 33 27). He is, therefore, more concerned with men and nations, with the moral, than with the physical world.

(b) Even His activity in Nature is first connected with His martial character. Earth, stars and rivers come to His battle (Jgs 5 4.20.21). The forces of Nature do the bidding of Israel's Deliverer from Egypt (Ex 8–10; 14 21). He causes sun and moon to stand while He delivers up the Amorites (Josh 10 12). Later, He employs the forces of Nature to chastise His people for infidelity and sin (2 S 24 15; 1 K 17 1). Amos declares that His moral rule extends to other nations and that it determines their destinies. In harmony with this idea, great catastrophes like the Deluge (Gen 7) and the overthrow of the Cities of the Plain (Gen 19) are ascribed to His moral will. In the same pragmatic manner the oldest creation narrative describes Him creating man, and as much of the world as He needed (Gen 2), but as yet the idea of a universal cause had not emerged, because the idea of a universe had not been formed. He acts as one of great, but limited, power and knowledge (Gen 11 5–8; 18 20). The more universal conception of Gen 1 belongs to the same stratum of thought as Second Isa. At every stage of the OT the metaphysical perfections of Jeh follow as an inference from His ethical preëminence.

(3) The most distinctive characteristic of Jeh, which finally rendered Him and His religion absolutely unique, was the moral factor. In saying that Jeh was a moral God, it is meant that He acted by free choice, in conformity with ends which He set to Himself, and which He also imposed upon His worshippers as their law of conduct.

(a) The most essential condition of a moral nature is found in His vivid personality, which at every stage of His self-revelation shines forth with an intensity that might be called aggressive. Divine personality and spirituality are never expressly asserted or defined in the OT; but nowhere in the history of religion are they more clearly asserted. The modes of their expression are, however, qualified by anthropomorphisms, by limitations, moral and physical. Jeh's jealousy (Ex 20 5; Dt 5 9; 6 15), His wrath and anger (Ex 32 10–12; Dt 7 4) and His inviolable holiness (Ex 19 21.22; 1 S 6 19; 2 S 6 7) appear sometimes to be irrational and immoral; but they are the assertion of His individual nature, of His self-consciousness as He distinguishes Himself from all else, in the moral language of the time, and are the conditions of His having any moral nature whatsoever. Likewise, He dwells in a place and moves from it (Jgs 5 5); men may see Him in visible form (Ex 24 10; Nu 12 8); He is always represented as having organs like those of the human body, arms, hands, feet, mouth, eyes and ears. By such sensuous and figurative language alone was it possible for a personal God to make Himself known to men.

(b) The content of Jeh's moral nature as revealed in the OT developed with the growth of moral ideas. Though His activity is most prominently martial, it is most permanently judicial, and is exercised through judges, priests and prophets. Tōrāh and mishpāṭ, "law" and "judgment," from the time of Moses onward, stand, the one for a body of customs that should determine men's relations to one another, and the other for the decision of individual cases in accordance with those customs, and both were regarded as issuing from Jeh. The people came to Moses "to inquire of God" when they had a matter in dispute, and he "judged between a man and his neighbor, and made them know the statutes of God, and his laws" (Ex 18 15.16). The judges appear mostly as leaders in war; but it is clear, as their name indicates, that they also gave judgments as between the people (Jgs 3 10; 4 4; 10 2.3; 1 S 7 16). The earliest literary prophets assume the existence of a law which priest and prophet had neglected to administer rightly (Hos 4 6; 8 1.12; Am 2 4). This implied that Jeh was thought of as actuated and acting by a consistent moral principle, which He also imposed on His people. Their morality may have varied much at different periods, but there is no reason to doubt that the Decalogue, and the moral teaching it involved, emanated substantially from Moses. "He taught them that Yahveh, if a stern, and often wrathful, Deity, was also a God of justice and purity. Linking the moral life to the religious idea, he may have taught them too that murder and theft, adultery and false witness, were abhorred and forbidden by their God" (Montefiore, Hibbert Lectures^{3}, 49). The moral teaching of the OT effected the transition from the national and collective to the individual and personal relation with Jeh. The most fundamental defect of Heb morality was that its application was confined within Israel itself and did little to determine the relation of the Israelites to people of other nations; and this limitation was bound up with Henotheism, the idea that Jeh was God of Israel alone. "The consequence of this national conception of Jeh was that there was no religious and moral bond regulating the conduct of the Hebrews with men of other nations. Conduct which between fellow-Hebrews was offensive in Jeh's eyes was inoffensive when practised by a Hebrew toward one who was not a Hebrew (Dt 23 19 f). . . . . In the latter case they were governed purely by considerations of expediency. This ethical limitation is the real explanation of the 'spoiling of the Egyptians'" (Ex 11 2.3) (G. Buchanan Gray, The Divine Discipline of Israel, 46, 48).

The first line of advance in the teaching of the prophets was to expand and deepen the moral demands of Jeh. So they removed at once the ethical and the theological limitations of the earlier view. But they were conscious that they were only developing elements already latent in the character and law of Jeh.

5. The Idea of God in the Prophetic Period

Two conditions called forth and determined the message of the 8th-cent. prophets—the degradation of morality and religion at home and the growing danger to Israel and Judah from the all-victorious Assyrian. With one voice the prophets declare and condemn the moral and social iniquity of Israel and Judah (Hos 4 1; Am 4 1; Isa 1 21–23). The worship of Jeh had been assimilated to the heathen religions around (Am 2 8; Hos 3 1; Isa 30 22). A time of prosperity had produced luxury, license and an easy security, depending upon the external bonds and ceremonies of religion. In the threatening attitude of Assyria, the prophets see the complement of Israel's unfaithfulness and sin, this the cause and that the instruments of Jeh's anger (Isa 10 5.6).

(1) Righteousness.—These circumstances forced into first prominence the righteousness of Jeh. It was an original attribute that had appeared even in His most martial acts (Jgs 5 4; 1 S 12 7). But the prophet's interpretation of Israel's history revealed its content on a larger scale. Jeh was not like the gods of the heathen, bound to the purposes and fortunes of His people. Their relation was not a natural bond, but a covenant of grace which He freely bestowed upon them, and He demanded as its condition, loyalty to Himself and obedience to His law. Impending calamities were not, as the naturalistic conception implied, due to the impotence of Jeh against the Assyr gods (Isa 31 1), but the judgment of God, whereby He applied impartially to the conduct of His people a standard of righteousness, which He both had in Himself and declared in judgment upon them. The prophets did not at first so much transform the idea of righteousness, as assert its application as between the people and Jeh. But in doing that they also rejected the external views of its realization. It consists not in unlimited gifts or in the costliest oblations. "What doth Jeh require of thee, but to do justly, and to love kindness, and to walk humbly with thy God?" (Mic 6 8). And it tends to become of universal application. Jeh will deal as a righteous judge with all nations, including Israel, and Israel as the covenant people bears the greater responsibility (Am 1–3). And a righteous judge that metes out even justice to all nations will deal similarly with individuals. The ministry of the prophets produced a vivid consciousness of the personal and individual relation of men to God. The prophets themselves were not members of a class, no order or school or profession, but men impelled by an inner and individual call of God, often against their inclination, to proclaim an unpopular message (Am 7 14.15; Isa 6; Jer 1 6–9; Ezk 3 14). Jeremiah and Ezekiel in terms denounced the old idea of collective responsibility (Jer 31 29 ff; Ezk 18). Thus in the prophets' application of the idea of righteousness to their time, two of the limitations adhering to the idea of God, at least in popular religion hitherto, were transcended. Jeh's rule is no longer limited to Israel, nor concerned only with the nation as a collective whole, but He deals impartially with every individual and nation alike. Other limitations also disappear. His anger and wrath, that once appeared irrational and unjust, now become the intensity of His righteousness. Nor is it merely forensic and retributive righteousness. It is rather a moral end, a chief good, which He may realize by loving-kindness and mercy and forgiveness as much as by punishment. Heb thought knows no opposition between God's righteousness and His goodness, between justice and mercy. The covenant of righteousness is like the relation of husband to wife, of father to child, one of loving-kindness and everlasting love (Hos 3 1; 11 4; Isa 1 18; 30 18; Mic 7 18; Isa 43 4; 54 8; Jer 31 3 ff.34; 9 24). The stirring events which showed Jeh's independence of Israel revealed the fulness of grace that was always latent in His relation to His people (Gen 33 11; 2 S 24 14). It was enshrined in the Decalogue (Ex 20 6), and proclaimed with incomparable grandeur in what may be the most ancient Mosaic tradition: "Jeh, Jeh, a God merciful and gracious, slow to anger and abundant in lovingkindness and truth; keeping lovingkindness for thousands, forgiving iniquity and transgression and sin" (Ex 34 6.7).

(2) The holiness of Jeh in the Prophets came to have a meaning closely akin to His righteousness. As an idea more distinctly religious and more exclusively applied to God, it was subject to greater changes of meaning with the development or degradation of religion. It was applied to anything withdrawn from common use to the service of religion—utensils, places, seasons, animals and men. Originally it was so far from the moral meaning it now has that it was used of the "sacred" prostitutes who ministered to the licentiousness of Canaanitish worship (Dt 23 18). Whether or not the root-idea of the word was "separateness," there is no doubt that it is applied to Jeh in the OT to express his separateness from men and his sublimity above them. It was not always a moral quality in Jeh; for He might be unapproachable because of His mere power and terror (1 S 6 20; Isa 8 13). But in the Prophets, and esp. in Isa, it acquires a distinctly moral meaning. In his vision, Isaiah hears Jeh proclaimed as "holy, holy, holy," and he is filled with the sense of his own sin and of that of Israel (Isa 6; cf 1 4; Am 2 7). But even here the term conveys more than moral perfection. Jeh is already "the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy" (Isa 57 15). It expresses the full Divinity of Jeh in His uniqueness and self-existence (1 S 2 2; Am 4 2; Hos 11 9). It would therefore seem to stand in antithesis to righteousness, as expressing those qualities of God, metaphysical and moral, by which He is distinguished and separated from men, while righteousness involves those moral activities and relations which man may share with God. But in the Prophets, God's entire being is moral and His whole activity is righteous. The meanings of the terms, though not identical, coincide; God's holiness is realized in righteousness. "God the Holy One is sanctified in righteousness" (Isa 5 16). So Isaiah's peculiar phrase, "the Holy One of Israel," brings God in His most exalted being into a relation of knowledge and moral reciprocity with Israel.

(3) The moralizing of righteousness and holiness universalized Deity.—From Amos downward Jeh's moral rule, and therefore His absolute power, were recognized as extending over all the nations surrounding Israel, and the great world-power of Assyria is but the rod of His anger and the instrument of His righteousness (Am 1–2; Isa 10 5; 13 5 ff; 19 1 ff). Idolatrous and polytheistic worship of all kinds are condemned. The full inference of Monotheism was only a gradual process, even with the prophets. It is not clear that the 8th-cent. prophets all denied the existence of other gods, though Isaiah's term for them, ʼĕlīlīm ("things of nought," "no-gods"), points in that direction. At least the monotheistic process had set in. And Jeh's control over other nations was not exercised merely from Israel's point of view. The issue of the judgment upon the two great powers of Egypt and Assyria was to be their conversion to the religion of Jeh (Isa 19 24.25; cf 2 2–4 = Mic 4 1–3). Yet Heb universalism never went beyond the idea that all nations should find their share in Jeh through Israel (Zec 8 23). The nations from the ends of the earth shall come to Jeh and declare that their fathers' gods were "lies, even vanity and things wherein there is no profit" (Jer 16 19). It is stated categorically that "Jeh he is God in heaven above and upon the earth beneath; there is none else" (Dt 4 39).

(4) The unity of God was the leading idea of Josiah's reformation. Jerus was cleansed of every accretion of Baal-worship and of other heathen religions that had established themselves by the side of the worship of Jeh (2 K 23 4–8.10–14). The semi-heathen worship of Jeh in many local shrines, which tended to disintegrate His unity, was swept away (2 K 23 8.9). The reform was extended to the Northern Kingdom (2 K 23 15–20), so that Jerus should be the sole habitation of Jeh on earth, and His worship there alone should be the symbol of unity to the whole Heb race.

But the monotheistic doctrine is first fully and consciously stated in Isa 40–66. There is no God but Jeh: other gods are merely graven images, and their worshippers commit the absurdity of worshipping the work of their own hands (Isa 42 8; 44 8–20). Jeh manifests His deity in His absolute sovereignty of the world, both of Nature and history. The prophet had seen the rise and fall of Assyria, the coming of Cyrus, the deportation and return of Judah's exiles, as incidents in the training of Israel for her world-mission to be "a light of the Gentiles" and Jeh's "salvation unto the end of the earth" (42 1–7; 49 1–6). Israel's world-mission, and the ordering of historical movements to the grand final purpose of universal salvation (45 23), is the philosophy of history complementary to the doctrine of God's unity and universal sovereignty.

(5) Creator and Lord.—A further inference is that He is Creator and Lord of the physical universe. Israel's call and mission is from Jeh who "created the heavens, and stretched them forth; he that spread abroad the earth and that which cometh out of it; he that giveth breath unto the people upon it, and spirit to them that walk therein" (42 5; cf 40 12.26; 44 24; 45 18; Gen 1). All the essential factors of Monotheism are here at last exhibited, not in abstract metaphysical terms, but as practical motives of religious life. His counsel and action are His own (Isa 40 13) Nothing is hid from Him; and the future like the past is known to Him (40 27; 42 9; 44 8; 48 6). Notwithstanding His special association with the temple in Jerus, He is "the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity"; the heaven is His throne, and no house or place can contain Him (57 15; 66 1). No force of history or Nature can withstand His purpose (41 17–20; 42 13; 43 13). He is "the First and the Last," an "Everlasting God" (40 28; 41 4; 48 12). Nothing can be likened to Him or compared with Him (46 5). As the heavens are higher than the earth, so His thoughts and ways transcend those of men (55 8.9). But anthropomorphic and anthropopathic expressions still abound. Eyes, mouth, ears, nostrils, hands, arms and face are His; He is a man of war (42 13; 63 1 ff); He cries like a travailing woman (42 14), and feeds His flock like a shepherd (40 11). Thus alone could the prophet express His full concrete Divinity.

(6) His compassion and love are expressed in a variety of ways that lead up directly to the NT doctrine of Divine Fatherhood. He folds Israel in His arms as a shepherd his lambs (40 11). Her scattered children are His sons and daughters whom He redeems and restores (43 5–7). In wrath for a moment He hides His face, but His mercy and kindness are everlasting (54 8). Greater than a mother's tenderness is Jeh's love for Israel (49 15; 66 13). "It would be easy to find in the prophet proof-texts for everything which theology asserts regarding God, with the exception perhaps that He is a spirit, by which is meant that He is a particular kind of substance" (A. B. Davidson in Skinner, Isa, II, xxix). But in truth the spirituality and personality of God are more adequately expressed in the living human language of the prophet than in the dead abstractions of metaphysics.

6. Idea of God in Post-exilic Judaism

Monotheism appears in this period as established beyond question, and in the double sense that Jeh the God of Israel is one Being, and that beside Him there is no other God. He alone is God of all the earth, and all other beings stand at an infinite distance from Him (Ps 18 31; 24 1 ff; 115 3 ff). The generic name God is frequently applied to Him, and the tendency appears to avoid the particular and proper name Jeh (see esp. Pss 73–89; Job; Eccl).

(1) New conditions.—Nothing essentially new appears, but the teaching of the prophets is developed under new influences. And what then was enforced by the few has now become the creed of the many. The teaching of the prophets had been enforced by the experiences of the exile. Israel had been punished for her sins of idolatry, and the faithful among the exiles had learned that Jeh's rule extended over many lands and nations. The foreign influences had been more favorable to Monotheism. The gods of Canaan and even of Assyria and Babylonia had been overthrown, and their peoples had given place to the Persians, who, in the religion of Zarathushtra, had advanced nearer to a pure Monotheism than any gentile race had done; for although they posited two principles of being, the Good and the Evil, they worshipped only Ahura-Mazda, the Good. When Persia gave way to Greece, the more cultured Greek, the Greek who had ideas to disseminate, and who established schools at Antioch or Alexandria, was a pure Monotheist.

(2) Divine attributes.—Although we do not yet find anything like a dogmatic account of God's attributes, the larger outlook upon the universe and the deeper reflection upon man's individual experience have produced more comprehensive and far-reaching ideas of God's being and activity. (a) Faith rests upon His eternity and unchangeableness (Ps

90 1.2; 102 27). His omniscience and omnipresence are expressed with every possible fulness (Ps 139; Job 26 6). His almighty power is at once the confidence of piety, and the rebuke of blasphemy or frowardness (Ps 74 12–17; 104 et passim; Job 36; 37 et passim; Ecclus 16 17 ff). (b) His most exalted and comprehensive attribute is His holiness; by it He swears as by Himself (Ps 89 35); it expresses His majesty (Ps 99 3.5.9) and His supreme power (Ps 60 6 ff). (c) His righteousness marks all His acts in relation to Israel and the nations around her (Ps 119 137–144; 129 4). (d) That both holiness and righteousness were conceived as moral qualities is reflected in the profound sense of sin which the pious knew (Ps 51) and revealed in the moral demands associated with them; truth, honesty and fidelity are the qualities of those who shall dwell in God's holy hill (Ps 15); purity, diligence, kindliness, honesty, humility and wisdom are the marks of the righteous man (Prov 10–11). (e) In Job and Prov wisdom stands forth as the preeminent quality of the ideal man, combining in itself all moral and intellectual excellences, and wisdom comes from God (Prov 2 6); it is a quality of His nature (Prov 8 22) and a mode of His activity (Prov 3 19; Ps 104 24). In the Hellenistic circles of Alexandria, wisdom was transformed into a philosophical conception, which is at once the principle of God's self-revelation and of His creative activity. Philo identifies it with His master-conception, the Logos. "Both Logos and Wisdom mean for Him the reason and mind of God, His image impressed upon the universe, His agent of creation and providence, the mediator through which He communicates Himself to man and the world, and His law imposed upon both the moral and physical universe" (Mansfield Essays, 296). In Book of Wisd it is represented as proceeding from God, "a breath of the power of God, and a clear effulgence of the glory of the Almighty . . . . an unspotted mirror of the working of God, and an image of his goodness" (7 25.26). In man, it is the author of knowledge, virtue and piety, and in the world it has been the guide and arbiter of its destiny from the beginning (chs 10–12). (f) But in the more purely Heb lit. of this period, the moral attribute of God that comes into greatest prominence is His beneficence. Goodness and mercy, faithfulness and loving-kindness, forgiveness and redemption are His willing gifts to Israel. "Like as a father pitieth his children, so Jeh pitieth them that fear him" (Ps 103 13; 145 8; 103 8; Ecclus 2 11). To say that God is loving and like a father goes far on the way to the doctrine that He is Love and Father, but not the whole way; for as yet His mercy and grace are manifested only in individual acts, and they are not the natural and necessary outflow of His nature. All these ideas of God meant less for the Jewish than for the Christian mind, because they were yet held subject to several limitations.

(3) Survival of limitations.—(a) We have evidence of a changed attitude toward anthropomorphisms. God no longer walks on earth, or works under human limitation. Where His eyes or ears or face or hands are spoken of, they are clearly figurative expressions. His activities are universal and invisible, and He dwells on high forevermore. Yet anthropomorphic limitations are not wholly overcome. The idea that He sleeps, though not to be taken literally, implies a defect of His power (Ps 44 23).

(b) In the metaphysical attributes, the chief limitation was the idea that God's dwelling-place on earth was on Mt. Zion in Jerus. He was no longer confined within Pal; His throne is in heaven (Ps 11 4; 103 19), and His glory above the heavens (113 4); but

> "In Judah is God known:
> His name is great in Israel.
> In Salem also is his tabernacle,
> And his dwelling-place in Zion"
> (Ps 76 1.2; 110 2; cf Ecclus 24 8 ff).

That these are no figures of speech is manifested in the yearning of the pious for the temple, and their despair in separation from it (Pss 42, 43; cf 122).

(c) This involved a moral limitation, the sense of God's favoritism toward Israel, which sometimes developed into an easy self-righteousness that had no moral basis. God's action in the world was determined by His favor toward Israel, and His loving acts were confined within the bounds of a narrow nationalism. Other nations are wicked and sinners, adversaries and oppressors, upon whom God is called to execute savage vengeance (Ps 109; 137 7–9). Yet Israel did not wholly forget that it was the servant of Jeh to proclaim His name among the nations (Ps 96 2.3; 117). Jeh is good to all, and His tender mercies are over all His works (Ps 145 9; Ecclus 18 13; cf Ps 104 14; Zec 14 16, and the Book of Jonah, which is a rebuke to Jewish particularism).

(d) God's holiness in the hands of the priests tended to become a material and formal quality, which fulfilled itself in established ceremonial, and His righteousness in the hands of the scribes tended to become an external law whose demands were satisfied by a mechanical obedience of works. This external conception of righteousness reacted upon the conception of God's government of the world. From the earliest times the Heb mind had associated suffering with the punishment of sin, and blessedness with the reward of virtue. In the post-exilic age the relation came to be thought of as one of strict correspondence between righteousness and reward and between sin and punishment. Righteousness, both in man and God, was not so much a moral state as a measurable sum of acts, in the one case, of obedience, and in the other, of reward or retribution. Conversely, every calamity and evil that befell men came to be regarded as the direct and equivalent penalty of a sin they had committed. The Book of Job is a somewhat inconclusive protest against this prevalent view.

These were the tendencies that ultimately matured into the narrow externalism of the scribes and Pharisees of Our Lord's time, which had substituted for the personal knowledge and service of God a system of mechanical acts of worship and conduct.

(4) Tendencies to abstractness.—Behind these defective ideas of God's attributes stood a more radical defect of the whole religious conception. The purification of the religion of Israel from Polytheism and idolatry, the affirmation of the unity of God and of His spirituality, required His complete separation from the manifoldness of visible existence. It was the only way, until the more adequate idea of a personal or spiritual unity, that embraced the manifold in itself, was developed. But it was an unstable conception, which tended on the one hand to empty the unity of all reality, and on the other to replace it by a new multiplicity which was not a unity. Both tendencies appear in post-exilic Judaism.

(a) The first effect of distinguishing too sharply between God and all created being was to set Him above and apart from all the world. This tendency had already appeared in Ezk, whose visions were rather symbols of God's presence than actual experiences of God. In Dnl even the visions appear only in dreams. The growth of the Canon of sacred lit. as the final record of the law of God, and the rise of the scribes as its professional interpreters, signified that God need not, and would not, speak face to face with man again; and the stricter organization of the priesthood and its sacrificial acts in Jerus tended to shut men generally out from access to God, and to reduce worship into a mechanical performance. A symptom of this fact was the disuse of the personal name Jeh and the substitution for it of more general and abstract terms like God and Lord.

(b) Not only an exaggerated awe, but also an element of skepticism, entered into the disuse of the proper name, a sense of the inadequacy of any name. In the Wisdom literature, God's incomprehensibility and remoteness appear for the first time as a conscious search after Him and a difficulty to find Him (Job 16 18–21; 23 3.8.9; Prov 30 2–4). Even the doctrine of immortality developed with the sense of God's present remoteness and the hope of His future nearness (Ps 17 15; Job 19 25). But Jewish theology was no cold Epicureanism or rationalistic Deism. Men's religious experiences apprehended God more intimately than their theology professed.

(c) By a "happy inconsistency" (Montefiore) they affirmed His immanence both in Nature (Ps 104; Wisd 8 1; 12 1.2) and in man's inner experience (Prov 15 3.11; 1 Ch 28 9; 29 17.18). Yet that transcendence was the dominating thought is manifest, most of all, in the formulation of a number of mediating conceptions, which, while they connected God and the world, also revealed the gulf that separated them.

(5) Logos, memra (mēmᵉrā') and angels.—This process of abstraction had gone farthest in Alexandria, where Jewish thought had so far assimilated Platonic philosophy, that Philo and Wisd conceive God as pure being who could not Himself come into any contact with the material and created world. His action and revelation are therefore mediated by His Powers, His Logos and His Wisdom, which, as personified or hypostatized attributes, become His vicegerents on earth. But in Pal, too, many mediating agencies grew up between God and man. The memra, or word of God, was not unlike Philo's Logos. The deified law partly corresponded to Alexandrian Wisdom. The Messiah had already appeared in the Prophets, and now in some circles He was expected as the mediator of God's special favor to Israel. The most important and significant innovation in this connection was the doctrine of angels. It was not entirely new, and Bab and Pers influences may have contributed to its development; but its chief cause lay in the general scheme of thought. Angels became intermediaries of revelation (Zec 1 9.12.19; 3 1 ff), the instruments of God's help (Dnl 3 28; 2 Macc 11 6), and of His punishment (Apoc Bar 21 23). The ancient gods of the nations became their patron angels (Dnl 10 13–20); but Israel's hatred of their gentile enemies often led to their transforming the latter's deities into demons. Incidentally a temporary solution of the problem of evil was thus found, by shifting all responsibility for evil from Jeh to the demons. The unity and supremacy of God were maintained by the doubtful method of delegating His manifold, and esp. His contradictory, activities to subordinate and partially to hostile spirits, which involved a new Polytheism. The problem of the One and the Many in ultimate reality cannot be solved by merely separating them. Heb Monotheism was unstable; it maintained its own truth even partially by affirming contradictories, and it contained in itself the demand for a further development. The few pluralistic phrases in the OT (as Gen 1 26; 3 22; 11 7; Isa 6 8, and 'Ĕlōhīm) are not adumbrations of the Trinity, but only philological survivals. But the Messianic hope was an open confession of the incompleteness of the OT revelation of God.

III. The Idea of God in the NT.

—The whole of the NT presupposes and rests upon the OT. Jesus Christ and His disciples inherited the idea of God revealed in the OT, as it survived in the purer strata of Jewish religion. So much was it to them and their contemporaries a matter of course, that it never occurred to them to proclaim or enforce the idea of God. Nor did they consciously feel the need of amending or changing it. They sought to correct some fallacious deductions made by later Judaism, and, unconsciously, they dropped the cruder anthropomorphisms and limitations of the OT idea. But their point of departure was always the higher teaching of the prophets and Pss, and their conscious endeavor in presenting God to men was to fulfil the Law and the Prophets (Mt 5 17). All the worthier ideas concerning God evolved in the OT reappear in the NT. He is One, supreme, living, personal and spiritual, holy, righteous and merciful. His power and knowledge are all-sufficient, and He is not limited in time or place. Nor can it be said that any distinctly new attributes are ascribed to God in the NT. Yet there is a difference. The conception and all its factors are placed in a new relation to man and the universe, whereby their meaning is transformed, enhanced and enriched. The last trace of particularism, with its tendency to Polytheism, disappears. God can no longer bear a proper name to associate Him with Israel, or to distinguish Him from other gods, for He is the God of all the earth, who is no respecter of persons or nations. Two new elements entered men's religious thought and gradually lifted its whole content to a new plane—Jesus Christ's experience and manifestation of the Divine Fatherhood, and the growing conviction of the church that Christ Himself was God and the full and final revelation of God.

1. Dependence on OT

2. Gentile Influence

Gr thought may also have influenced NT thought, but in a comparatively insignificant and subordinate way. Its content was not taken over bodily as was that of Heb thought, and it did not influence the fountain head of NT ideas. It did not color the mind and teaching of Jesus Christ. It affected the form rather than matter of NT teaching. It appears in the clear-cut distinction between flesh and spirit, mind and body, which emerges in Paul's Epp., and so it helped to define more accurately the spirituality of God. The idea of the Logos in John, and the kindred idea of Christ as the image of God in Paul and He, owe something to the influence of the Platonic and Stoic schools. As this is the constructive concept employed in the NT to define the religious significance of Christ and His essential relation to God, it modifies the idea of God itself, by introducing a distinction within the unity into its innermost meaning.

3. No Theistic Proofs in the NT

Philosophy never appears in the NT on its own account, but only as subservient to Christian experience. In the NT as in the OT, the existence of God is taken for granted as the universal basis of all life and thought. Only in three passages of Paul's, addressed to heathen audiences, do we find anything approaching a natural theology, and these are concerned rather with defining the nature of God, than with proving His existence. When the people of Lystra would have worshipped Paul and Barnabas as heathen gods, the apostle protests that God is not like men, and bases His majesty upon His creatorship of all things (Acts 14 15). He urges the same argument at Athens, and appeals for its confirmation to the evidences of man's need of God which he had found in Athens itself (Acts 17 23–31). The same natural witness of the soul, face to face with the universe, is again in Rom made the ground of universal responsibility to God (1 18–21). No formal proof of God's existence is offered in the NT. Nor are the metaphysical attributes of God, His infinity, omnipotence and omniscience, as defined in systematic theology, at all set forth in the NT. The ground for these deductions is provided in the religious experience that finds God in Christ all-sufficient.

4. Divine Fatherhood

The fundamental and central idea about God in NT teaching is His Fatherhood, and it determines all that follows. In some sense the idea was not unknown to heathen religions. Greeks and Romans acknowledged Father Zeus or Jupiter as the creator and preserver of Nature, and as standing in some special relation to men. In the OT the idea appears frequently, and has a richer content. Not only is God the creator and preserver of Israel, but He deals with her as a father with his child. "Like as a father pitieth his children, so Jeh pitieth them that fear Him" (Ps 103 13; cf Dt 1 31; 32 6; Jer 3 4.19; 31 20; Isa 63 16; Hos 11 1; Mal 3 17). Even His chastisements are "as a man chasteneth his son" (Dt 8 5; Isa 64 8). The same idea is expressed under the figure of a mother's tender care (Isa 49 15; 66 13; Ps 27 10), and it is embedded in the covenant relation. But in the OT the idea does not occupy the central and determinative position it has in NT, and it is always limited to Israel.

(1) In the teaching of Jesus Christ—God is preeminently the Father. It is his customary term for the Supreme Being, and it is noteworthy that Jesus' usage has never been quite naturalized. We still say "God" where Jesus would have said "the Father." He meant that the essential nature of God, and His relation to men, is best expressed by the attitude and relation of a father to his children; but God is Father in an infinitely higher and more perfect degree than any man. He is "good" and "perfect," the heavenly Father, in contrast with men, who, even as fathers, are evil (Mt 5 48; 7 11). What in them is an ideal imperfectly and intermittently realized, is in Him completely fulfilled. Christ thought not of the physical relation of origin and derivation, but of the personal relation of love and care which a father bestows upon his children. The former relation is indeed implied, for the Father is ever working in the world (Jn 5 17), and all things lie in His power (Lk 22 42). By His preserving power, the least as well as the greatest creature lives (Mt 6 26; 10 29). But it is not the fact of God's creative, preserving and governing power, so much as the manner of it, that Christ emphasizes. He is absolutely good in all His actions and relations (Mt 7 11; Mk 10 18). To Him men and beasts turn for all they need, and in Him they find safety, rest and peace (Mt 6 26.32; 7 11). His goodness goes forth spontaneously and alights upon all living things, even upon the unjust and His enemies (Mt 5 45). He rewards the obedient (Mt 6 1; 7 21), forgives the disobedient (Mt 6 14; cf 18 35) and restores the prodigal (Lk 15 11 ff). "Fatherhood is love, original and underived, anticipating and undeserved, forgiving and educating, communicating and drawing to his heart" (Beyschlag, NT Theol, I, 82). To the Father, therefore, should men pray for all good things (Mt 6 9), and He is the ideal of all perfection, to which they should seek to attain (Mt 5 48). Such is the general character of God as expressed in His Fatherhood, but it is realized in different ways by those who stand to Him in different relations.

(a) Jesus Christ knows the Father as no one else does, and is related to Him in a unique manner. The idea is central in His teaching, because the fact is fundamental in His experience. On His first personal appearance in history He declares that He must be about His Father's business (Lk 2 49), and at the last He commends His spirit into His Father's hands. Throughout His life, His filial consciousness is perfect and unbroken. "I and the Father are one" (Jn 10 30). As He knows the Father, so the Father knows and acknowledges Him. At the opening of His ministry, and again at its climax in the transfiguration, the Father bears witness to His perfect sonship (Mk 1 11; 9 7). It was a relation of mutual love and confidence, unalloyed and infinite. "The Father loveth the Son, and hath given all things into his hand" (Jn 3 35; 5 20). The Father sent the Son into the world, and intrusted Him with his message and power (Mt 11 27). He gave Him those who believed in Him, to receive His word (Jn 6 37.44.45; 17 6.8). He does the works and speaks the words of the Father who sent Him (Jn 5 36; 8 18.29; 14 24). His dependence upon the Father, and His trust in Him are equally complete (Jn 11 41; 12 27 f; 17). In this perfect union of Christ with God, unclouded by sin, unbroken by infidelity, God first became for a human life on earth all that He could and would become. Christ's filial consciousness was in fact and experience the full and final revelation of God. "No one knoweth the Son, save the Father; neither doth any know the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal him" (Mt 11 27). Not only can we see in Christ what perfect sonship is, but in His filial consciousness the Father Himself is so completely reflected that we may know the perfect Father also. "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father" (Jn 14 9; cf 8 19). Nay, it is more than a reflection: so completely is the mind and will of Christ identified with that of the Father, that they interpenetrate, and the words and works of the Father shine out through Christ. "The words that I say unto you I speak not from myself: but the Father abiding in me doeth his works. Believe me that I am in the Father, and the Father in me" (Jn 14 10.11). As the Father, so is the Son, for men to honor or to hate (5 23; 15 23). In the last day, when He comes to execute the judgment which the Father has intrusted to Him, He shall come in the glory of the Father (Mt 16 27; Mk 8 38; Lk 9 26). In all this Jesus is aware that His relation to the Father is unique. What in Him is original and realized, in others can only be an ideal to be gradually realized by His communication. "I am the way, and the truth, and the life: no one cometh unto the Father, but by me" (Jn 14 6). He is, therefore, rightly called the "only begotten son" (3 16), and His contemporaries believed that He made Himself equal to God (5 18).

(b) Through Christ, His disciples and hearers, too, may know God as their Father. He speaks of "your Father," "your heavenly Father." To them as individuals, it means a personal relation; He is "thy Father" (Mt 6 4.18). Their whole conduct should be determined by the consciousness of the Father's intimate presence (6 1.4). To do His will is the ideal of life (7 21; 12 50). More explicitly, it is to act as He does, to love and forgive as He loves and forgives (5 45); and, finally, to be perfect as He is perfect (5 48). Thus do men become sons of their Father who is in heaven. Their peace and safety lay in their knowledge of His constant and all-sufficient care (6 26.32). The ultimate goal of men's relation to Christ is that through Him they should come to a relation with the Father like His relation both to the Father and to them, wherein Father, Son, and believers form a social unity (Jn 14 21; 17 23; cf ver 21).

(c) While God's fatherhood is thus realized and revealed, originally and fully in Christ, derivatively and partially in believers, it also has significance for all men. Every man is born a child of God and heir of His kingdom (Lk 18 16). During childhood, all men are objects of His fatherly love and care (Mt 18 10), and it is not His will that one of them should perish (18 14). Even if they become His enemies, He still bestows His beneficence upon the evil and the unjust (Mt 5 44.45; Lk 6 35). The prodigal son may become unworthy to be called a son, but the father always remains a father. Men may become so far unfaithful that in them the fatherhood is no longer manifest and that their inner spirits own not God, but the devil, as their father (Jn 8 42–44). So their filial relation to God may be broken, but His nature and attitude are not changed. He is the Father absolutely, and as Father is He perfect (Mt 5 48). The essential and universal Divine Fatherhood finds its eternal and continual object in the only begotten Son who is in the bosom of the Father. As a relation with men, it is qualified by their attitude to God; while some by faithlessness make it of no avail, others by obedience become in the reality of their experience sons of their Father in heaven. See Children of God.

(2) In the apostolic teaching, although the Fatherhood of God is not so prominently or so abundantly exhibited as it was by Jesus Christ, it lies at the root of the whole system of salvation there presented. Paul's central doctrine of justification by faith is but the scholastic form of the parable of the Prodigal Son. John's one idea, that God is love, is but an abstract statement of His fatherhood. In complete accord with Christ's teaching, that only through Himself men know the Father and come to Him, the whole apostolic system of grace is mediated through Christ the Son of God, sent because "God so loved the world" (Jn 3 16), that through His death men might be reconciled to God (Rom 5 10; 8 3). He speaks to men through the Son who is the effulgence of His glory, and the very image of His substance (He 1 2.3). The central position assigned to Christ involves the central position of the Fatherhood.

As in the teaching of Jesus, so in that of the apostles, we distinguish three different relationships in which the fatherhood is realized in varying degrees: (a) Primarily He is the God and Father of Our Lord Jesus Christ (Rom 15 6; 2 Cor 1 3). As such He is the source of every spiritual blessing in the heavenly places in Christ (Eph 1 3). Through Christ we have access unto the Father (Eph 2 18). (b) He is, therefore, God our Father (Rom 1 7; 1 Cor 1 3). Believers are sons of God through faith in Christ Jesus (Gal 3 26). "For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, these are sons of God" (Rom 8 14). These receive the spirit of adoption whereby they cry, Abba, Father (Rom 8 15; Gal 4 6). The figure of adoption has sometimes been understood as implying the denial of man's natural sonship and God's essential Fatherhood, but that would be pressing the figure beyond Paul's purpose. (c) The apostles' teaching, like Christ's, is that man in sin cannot possess the filial consciousness or know God as Father; but God, in His attitude to man, is always and essentially Father. In the sense of creaturehood and dependence, man in any condition is a son of God (Acts 17 28). And to speak of any other natural sonship which is not also morally realized is meaningless. From God's standpoint, man even in his sin is a possible son, in the personal and moral sense; and the whole process and power of his awakening to the realization of his sonship issues from the fatherly love of God, who sent His Son and gave the Spirit (Rom 5 5.8). He is "the Father" absolutely, "one God and Father of all, who is over all, and through all, and in all. But unto each one of us was the grace given according to the measure of the gift of Christ" (Eph 4 6.7).

5. God is King

After the Divine Fatherhood, the kingdom of God (Mk and Lk) or of heaven (Mt) is the next ruling conception in the teaching of Jesus. As the doctrine of the Fatherhood sets forth the individual relation of men to God, that of the kingdom defines their collective and social condition, as determined by the rule of the Father.

(1) The kingdom of God.—Christ adopted and transformed the OT idea of Jeh's rule into an inner and spiritual principle of His gospel, without, however, quite detaching it from the external and apocalyptic thought of His time. He adopts the Jewish idea in so far as it involves the enforcing of God's rule; and in the immediate future He anticipates such a reorganization of social conditions in the manifestation of God's reign over men and Nature, as will ultimately amount to a regeneration of all things in accordance with the will of God (Mk 9 1; 13 30; Mt 16 28; 19 28). But He eliminated the particularism and favoritism toward the Jews, as well as the non-moral, easy optimism as to their destiny in the kingdom, which obtained in contemporary thought. The blessings of the kingdom are moral and spiritual in their nature, and the conditions of entrance into it are moral too (Mt 8 11; 21 31.43; 23 37.38; Lk 13 29). They are humility, hunger and thirst after righteousness, and the love of mercy, purity and peace (Mt 5 3–10; 18 1.3; cf Mt 20 26–28; 25 34; 7 21; Jn 3 3; Lk 17 20.21). The king of such a kingdom is, therefore, righteous, loving and gracious toward all men; He governs by the inner communion of spirit with spirit and by the loving coördination of the will of His subjects with his own will.

(2) Its king.—But who is the king? (a) Generally in Mk and Lk, and sometimes in Mt, it is called the kingdom of God. In several parables, the Father takes the place of king, and it is the Father that gives the kingdom (Lk 12 32). God the Father is therefore the King, and we are entitled to argue from Jesus' teaching concerning the kingdom to His idea of God. The will of God is the law of the kingdom, and the ideal of the kingdom is, therefore, the character of God. (b) But in some passages Christ reveals the consciousness of his own Kingship. He approves Peter's confession of his Messiahship, which involves Kingship (Mt 16 16). He speaks of a time in the immediate future when men shall see "the Son of man coming in his kingdom" (Mt 16 28). As judge of all men, He designates Himself king (Mt 25 34; Lk 19 38). He accepts the title king from Pilate (Mt 27 11.12; Mk 15 2; Lk 23 3; Jn 18 37), and claims a kingdom which is not of this world (Jn 18 36). His disciples look to Him for the restoration of the kingdom (Acts 1 6). His kingdom, like that of God, is inner, moral and spiritual. (c) But there can be only one moral kingdom, and only one supreme authority in the spiritual realm. The coördination of the two kingships must be found in their relation to the Fatherhood. The two ideas are not antithetical or even independent. They may have been separate and even opposed as Christ found them, but He used them as two points of apperception in the minds of His hearers, by which He communicated to them His one idea of God, as the Father who ruled a spiritual kingdom by love and righteousness, and ordered Nature and history to fulfil His purpose of grace. Men's prayer should be that the Father's kingdom may come (Mt 6 9.10). They enter the kingdom by doing the Father's will (Mt 7 21). It is their Father's good pleasure to give them the kingdom (Lk 12 32). The Fatherhood is primary, but it carries with it authority, government, law and order, care and provision, to set up and organize a kingdom reflecting a Father's love and expressing His will.

And as Christ is the revealer and mediator of the Fatherhood, He also is the messenger and bearer of the kingdom. In his person, preaching and works, the kingdom is present to men (Mt 4 17.23; 12 28), and as its king He claims men's allegiance and obedience (Mt 11 28.29). His sonship constitutes His relation to the kingdom. As son He obeys the Father, depends upon Him, represents Him to men, and is one with Him. And in virtue of this relation, He is the messenger of the kingdom and its principle, and at the same time He shares with the Father its authority and Kingship.

(3) Apostolic teaching.—In the apostolic writings, the emphasis upon the elements of kingship, authority, law and righteousness is greater than in the gospels. The kingdom is related to God (Gal 5 21; Col 4 11; 1 Thess 2 12; 2 Thess 1 5), and to Christ (Col 1 13; 2 Tim 4 1.18; 2 Pet 1 11), and to both together (Eph 5 5; cf 1 Cor 15 24). The phrase "the kingdom of the Son of his love" sums up the idea of the joint kingship, based upon the relation of Father and Son.

6. Moral Attributes

The nature and character of God are summed up in the twofold relation of Father and King in which He stands to men, and any abstract statements that may be made about Him, any attributes that may be ascribed to Him, are deductions from His royal Fatherhood.

(1) Personality.—That a father and king is a person needs not to be argued, and it is almost tautology to say that a person is a spirit. Christ relates directly the spirituality of God to His Fatherhood. "The true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and truth: for such doth the Father seek to be his worshippers. God is Spirit" (Jn 4 23.24 m). Figurative expressions denoting the same truth are the Johannine phrases, 'God is life' (1 Jn 5 20), and "God is light" (1 Jn 1 5).

(2) Love is the most characteristic attribute of Fatherhood. It is the abstract term that most fully expresses the concrete character of God as Father. In John's theology, it is used to sum up all God's perfections in one general formula. God is love, and where no love is, there can be no knowledge of God and no realization of Him (1 Jn 4 8.16). With one exception (Lk 11 42), the phrase "the love of God" appears in the teaching of Jesus only as it is represented in the Fourth Gospel. There it expresses the bond of union and communion, issuing from God, that holds together the whole spiritual society, God, Christ and believers (Jn 15 10; 14 21). Christ's mission was that of revelation, rather than of interpretation, and what in person and act He represents before men as the living Father, the apostles describe as almighty and universal love. They saw and realized this love first in the Son, and esp. in His sacrificial death. It is "the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Rom 8 39). "God commendeth his own love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us" (Rom 5 8; cf Eph 2 4). Love was fully made known in Christ's death (1 Jn 3 16). The whole process of the incarnation and death of Christ was also a sacrifice of God's and the one supreme manifestation of His nature as love (1 Jn 4 9.10; cf Jn 3 16). The love of God is His fatherly relation to Christ extended to men through Christ. By the Father's love bestowed upon us, we are called children of God (1 Jn 3 1). Love is not only an emotion of tenderness and beneficence which bestows on men the greatest gifts, but a relation to God which constitutes their entire law of life. It imposes upon men the highest moral demands, and communicates to them the moral energy by which alone they can be met. It is law and grace combined. The love of God is perfected only in those who keep the word of Jesus Christ the Righteous (1 Jn 2 5). "For this is the love of God, that we keep his commandments" (1 Jn 5 3). It is manifested esp. in brotherly love (1 Jn 4 12.20). It cannot dwell with worldliness (1 Jn 2 15) or callous selfishness (3 17). Man derives it from God as he is made the son of God, begotten of Him (4 7).

(3) Righteousness and holiness were familiar ideas to Jesus and His disciples, as elements in the Divine character. They were current in the thought of their time, and they stood foremost in the OT conception. They were therefore adopted in their entirety in the NT, but they stand in a different context. They are coördinated with, and even subordinated to, the idea of love. As kingship stands to fatherhood, so righteouness and holiness stand to love.

(a) Once we find the phrase "Holy Father" spoken by Jesus (Jn 17 11; cf 1 Pet 1 15.16). But generally the idea of holiness is associated with God in His activity through the Holy Spirit, which renews, enlightens, purifies and cleanses the lives of men. Every vestige of artificial, ceremonial, non-moral meaning disappears from the idea of holiness in the NT. The sense of separation remains only as separation from sin. So Christ as high priest is "holy, guileless, undefiled, separated from sinners" (He 7 26). Where it dwells, no uncleanness must be (1 Cor 6 19). Holiness is not a legal or abstract morality, but a life made pure and noble by the love of God shed abroad in men's hearts (Rom 5 5). "The kingdom of God is . . . . righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Spirit" (Rom 14 17).

(b) Righteousness as a quality of character is practically identical with holiness in the NT. It is opposed to sin (Rom 6 13.20) and iniquity (2 Cor 6 14). It is coupled with goodness and truth as the fruit of the light (Eph 5 9; cf 1 Tim 6 11; 2 Tim 2 22). It implies a rule or standard of conduct, which in effect is one with the life of love and holiness. It is brought home to men by the conviction of the Holy Spirit (Jn 16 8). In its origin it is the righteousness of God (Mt 6 33; cf Jn 17 25). In Paul's theology, "the righteousness of God through faith in Jesus Christ unto all them that believe" (Rom 3 22) is the act of God, out of free grace, declaring and treating the sinner as righteous, that he thereby may become righteous, even as "we love, because he first loved us" (1 Jn 4 19). The whole character of God, then, whether we call it love, holiness or righteousness, is revealed in His work of salvation, wherein He goes forth to men in love and mercy, that they may be made citizens of His kingdom, heirs of His righteousness, and participators in His love.

7. Metaphysical Attributes

The abstract being of God and His metaphysical attributes are implied, but not defined, in the NT. His infinity, omnipotence and omniscience are not enunciated in terms, but they are postulated in the whole scheme of salvation which He is carrying to completion. He is Lord of heaven and earth (Mt 11 25). The forces of Nature are at His command (Mt 5 45; 6 30). He can answer every prayer and satisfy every need (Mt 7 7–12). All things are possible to Him (Mk 10 27; 14 36). He created all things (Eph 3 9). All earthly powers are derived from Him (Rom 13 1). By His power, He raised Christ from the dead and subjected to Him "all rule, and authority, and power, and dominion" in heaven and on earth (Eph 1 20.21; cf Mt 28 18). Every power and condition of existence are subordinated to the might of His love unto His saints (Rom 8 38.39). Neither time nor place can limit Him: He is the eternal God (Rom 16 26). His knowledge is as infinite as His power; He knows what the Son and the angels know not (Mk 13 32). He knows the hearts of men (Lk 16 15) and all their needs (Mt 6 8.32). His knowledge is esp. manifested in His wisdom by which He works out His purpose of salvation, "the manifold wisdom of God, according to the eternal purpose which he purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Eph 3 10.11). The teaching of the NT implies that all perfections of power, condition and being cohere in God, and are revealed in His love. They are not developed or established on metaphysical grounds, but they flow out of His perfect fatherhood. Earthly fathers do what good they can for their children, but the Heavenly Father does all things for the best for His children—"to them that love God all things work together for good"—because He is restricted by no limits of power, will or wisdom (Mt 7 11; Rom 8 28).

8. The Unity of God

It is both assumed through the NT and stated categorically that God is one (Mk 12 29; Rom 3 30; Eph 4 6). No truth had sunk more deeply into the Heb mind by this time than the unity of God.

(1) The divinity of Christ.—Yet it is obvious from what has been written, that Jesus Christ claimed a power, authority and position so unique that they can only be adequately described by calling Him God; and the apostolic church both in worship and in doctrine accorded Him that honor. All that they knew of God as now fully and finally revealed was summed up in His person, "for in him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily" (Col 2 9). If they did not call Him God, they recognized and named Him everything that God meant for them.

(2) The Holy Spirit.—Moreover, the Holy Spirit is a third term that represents a Divine person in the experience, thought and language of Christ and His disciples. In the Johannine account of Christ's teaching, it is probable that the Holy Spirit is identified with the risen Lord Himself (Jn 14 16.17; cf ver 18), and Paul seems also to identify them in at least one passage: "the Lord is the Spirit" (2 Cor 3 17). But in other places the three names are ranged side by side as representing three distinct persons (Mt 28 19; 2 Cor 13 14; Eph 4 4–6).

(3) The church's problem.—But how does the unity of God cohere with the Divine status of the Son and the distinct subsistence of the Holy Spirit? Jesus Christ affirmed a unity between Himself and the Father (Jn 10 30), a unity, too, which might be realized in a wider sphere, where the Father, the Son and believers should form one society (17 21.23), but He reveals no category which would construe the unity of the Godhead in a manifoldness of manifestation. The experience of the first Christians as a rule found Christ so entirely sufficient to all their religious needs, so filled with all the fulness of God, that the tremendous problem which had arisen for thought did not trouble them. Paul expresses his conception of the relation of Christ to God under the figure of the image. Christ "is the image of the invisible God, the firstborn of all creation" (Col 1 15; 2 Cor 4 4). Another writer employs a similar metaphor. Christ is "the effulgence of [God's] glory, and the very image of his substance" (He 1 3). But these figures do not carry us beyond the fact, abundantly evident elsewhere, that Christ in all things represented God because He participated in His being. In the prologue to the Fourth Gospel, the doctrine of the Word is developed for the same purpose. The eternal Reason of God who was ever with Him, and of Him, issues forth as revealed thought, or spoken word, in the person of Jesus Christ, who therefore is the eternal Word of God incarnate. So far and no farther the NT goes. Jesus Christ is God revealed; we know nothing of God, but that which is manifest in Him. His love, holiness, righteousness and purpose of grace, ordering and guiding all things to realize the ends of His fatherly love, all this we know in and through Jesus Christ. The Holy Spirit takes of Christ's and declares it to men (Jn 16 14). The problems of the coördination of the One with the Three, of personality with the plurality of consciousness, of the Infinite with the finite, and of the Eternal God with the Word made flesh, were left over for the church to solve. The Holy Spirit was given to teach it all things and guide it into all the truth (Jn 16 13). "And lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world" (Mt 28 20).

GOD, IMAGE OF: In Gen 1 26.27, the truth is declared that God created man in His own "image" (çelem), after His "likeness" (d^{e}mūth). The two ideas denote the same thing—resemblance to God. The like conception of man, tacit or avowed, underlies all revelation. It is given in Gen 9 6 as the ground of the prohibition of the shedding of man's blood; is echoed in Ps 8; is reiterated frequently in the NT (1 Cor 11 7; Eph 4 24; Col 3 10; Isa 3 9). The nature of this image of God in man is discussed in other arts.—see esp. ANTHROPOLOGY. It lies in the nature of the case that the "image" does not consist in bodily form; it can only reside in spiritual qualities, in man's mental and moral attributes as a self-conscious, rational, personal agent, capable of self-determination and obedience to moral law. This gives man his position of lordship in creation, and invests his being with the sanctity of personality. The image of God, defaced, but not entirely lost through sin, is restored in yet more perfect form in the redemption of Christ. See the full discussion in the writer's work, God's Image in Man and Its Defacement; see also Dr. J. Laidlaw, The Bible Doctrine of Man.

LITERATURE

I. Introduction.—To an extent beyond the appreciation of modern and western minds the people of Bib. times and lands valued the name of the person. They always gave to it symbolical or character meaning.

While our modern names are almost exclusively designatory, and intended merely for identification, the Bib. names were also descriptive, and often prophetic. Religious significance nearly always inhered in the name, a parent relating his child to the Deity, or declaring its consecration to the Deity, by joining the name of the Deity with the service which the child should render, or perhaps commemorating in a name the favor of God in the gracious gift of the child, e.g. Nathanael ("gift of God"); Samuel ("heard of God"); Adonijah ("Jeh is my Lord"), etc. It seems to us strange that at its birth, the life and character of a child should be forecast by its parents in a name; and this unique custom has been regarded by an unsympathetic criticism as evidence of the origin of such names and their attendant narratives long subsequent to the completed life itself; such names, for example, as Abraham, Sarah, etc. But that this was actually done, and that it was regarded as a matter of course, is proved by the name given to Our Lord at His birth: "Thou shalt call his name Jesus; for it is he that shall save his people" (Mt 1 21). It is not unlikely that the giving of a character name represented the parents' purpose and fidelity in the child's training, resulting necessarily in giving to the child's life that very direction, which the name indicated. A child's name, therefore, became both a prayer and a consecration, and its realization in character became often a necessary psychological effect. Great honor or dishonor was attached to a name. The OT writings contain many and varied instances of this. Sometimes contempt for certain reprobate men would be most expressively indicated by a change of name, e.g. the change of Esh-baal, "man of Baal," to Ish-bosheth, "man of shame" (2 S 2 8 ff), and the omission of Jeh from the name of the apostate king, Ahaz (2 K 15 38, etc). The name of the last king of Judah was most expressively changed by Nebuchadnezzar from Mattaniah to Zedekiah, to assure his fidelity to his overlord who made him king (2 K 24 17). See NAMES, PROPER.

1. The Phrase "His Name"

Since the Scriptures of the OT and NT are essentially for purposes of revelation, and since the Hebrews laid such store by names, we should confidently expect them to make the Divine name a medium of revelation of the first importance. People accustomed by long usage to significant character indications in their own names, necessarily would regard the names of the Deity as expressive of His nature. The very phrase "name of Jeh," or "His name," as applied to the Deity in Bib. usage, is most interesting and suggestive, sometimes expressing comprehensively His revelation in Nature (Ps 8 1; cf 138 2); or marking the place of His worship, where men will call upon His name (Dt 12 5); or used as a synonym of His various attributes, e.g. faithfulness (Isa 48 9), grace (Ps 23 3), His honor (Ps 79 9), etc. "Accordingly, since the name of God denotes this God Himself as He is revealed, and as He desires to be known by His creatures, when it is said that God will make a name for Himself by His mighty deeds, or that the new world of the future shall be unto Him for a name, we can easily understand that the name of God is often synonymous with the glory of God, and that the expressions for both are combined in the utmost variety of ways, or used alternately" (Schultz, OT Theology, ET, I, 124–25; cf Ps 72 19; Isa 63 14; also Davidson, OT Theol., 37–38).

2. Classification of the Subject

From the important place which the Divine name occupies in revelation, we would expect frequency of occurrence and diversity of form; and this is just that which we find to be true. The many forms or varieties of the name will be considered under the following heads: (1) Absolute or Personal Names, (2) Attributive, or Qualifying Names, and (3) Names of God in the NT. Naturally and in course of time attributive names tend to crystallize through frequent use and devotional regard into personal names; e.g. the attributive adj. ḳadhōsh, "holy," becomes the personal, transcendental name for Deity in Job and Isa. For fuller details of each name reference may be made to separate articles.

II. Absolute or Personal Names.—The first form of the Divine name in the Bible is אֱלֹהִים, 'Ĕlōhīm, ordinarily tr^d "God" (Gen 1 1). This is the most frequently used name in the OT, as its equivalent θεός, theós, is in the NT, occurring in Gen alone approximately 200 t. It is one of a group of kindred words, to which belong also 'Ēl and 'Ĕlō^{a}h. (1) Its form is pl., but the construction is uniformly sing., i.e. it governs a sing. vb. or adj., unless used of heathen divinities (Ps 96 5; 97 7). It is characteristic of Heb that extension, magnitude and dignity, as well as actual multiplicity, are expressed by the pl. It is not reasonable, therefore, to assume that plurality of form indicates primitive Sem polytheism. On the contrary, historic Heb is unquestionably and uniformly monotheistic.

1. 'Ĕlōhīm, "God"

(2) The derivation is quite uncertain. Gesenius, Ewald and others find its origin in אוּל, 'ūl, "to be strong," from which also are derived 'ayil, "ram," and 'ēlāh, "terebinth"; it is then an expanded pl. form of 'ēl; others trace it to אלה, 'ālah, "to terrify," and the sing. form is found in the infrequent אֱלוֹהַּ, 'ĕlō^{a}h, which occurs chiefly in poetical books; BDB inclines to the derivation from אָלָה, 'ālāh, "to be strong," as the root of the three forms, 'Ēl, 'Ĕlō^{a}h and 'Ĕlōhīm, although admitting that the whole question is involved in uncertainty (for full statement see BDB, s.v. אלה); a somewhat fanciful suggestion is the Arab. root 'ûl, "to be in front," from which comes the meaning "leader"; and still more fanciful is the suggested connection with the prep. אֶל, 'el, signifying God as the "goal" of man's life and aspiration. The origin must always lie in doubt, since the derivation is prehistoric, and the name, with its kindred words 'Ēl and 'Ĕlō^{a}h, is common to Sem languages and religions and beyond the range of Heb records.

(3) It is the reasonable conclusion that the meaning is "might" or "power"; that it is common to Sem language; that the form is pl. to express majesty or "all-mightiness," and that it is a generic, rather than a specific personal, name for Deity, as is indicated by its application to those who represent the Deity (Jgs 5 8; Ps 82 1) or who are in His presence (1 S 28 13).

2. 'Ĕlō^{a}h

The sing. form of the preceding name, אֱלוֹהַּ, 'Ĕlō^{a}h, is confined in its use almost exclusively to poetry, or to poetic expression, being characteristic of the Book of Job, occurring oftener in that book than in all other parts of the OT. It is, in fact, found in Job oftener than the elsewhere more ordinary pl. 'Elōhīm. For derivation and meaning see above under 1 (2). Cf also the Aram. form, אֱלָהּ, 'ĕlāh, found frequently in Ezr and Dnl.

3. 'Ēl

In the group of Sem languages, the most common word for Deity is El (אֵל, 'ēl), represented by the Bab îlu and the Arab. 'Allah. It is found throughout the OT, but oftener in Job and Pss than in all the other books. It occurs seldom in the historical books, and not at all in Lev. The same variety of derivations is attributed to it as to ELOHIM (q.v.), most probable of which is אוּל, 'ūl, "to be strong." BDB interprets 'ūl as meaning "to be in front," from which came 'ayil, "ram," the one in front of the flock, and 'ēlāh, the prominent "terebinth," deriving El from 'ālāh, "to be strong." It occurs in many of the more ancient names; and, like Elohim, it is used of pagan gods. It is frequently combined with nouns or adjectives to express the Divine name with reference to particular attributes or phases of His being, as 'Ēl 'Elyōn, 'Ēl-Rō'ī, etc (see below under III, "Attributive Names").

4. 'Ādhōn, 'Ădhōnāy

An attributive name, which in prehistoric Heb had already passed over into a generic name of God, is אָדוֹן, 'Ādhōn, אֲדֹנָי, 'Ădhōnāy, the latter formed from the former, being the const. pl., 'ădhōnē, with the 1st pers. ending ay, which has been lengthened to āy and so retained as characteristic of the proper name and distinguishing it from the possessive "my Lord." AV does not distinguish, but renders both as possessive, "my Lord" (Jgs 6 15; 13 8), and as personal name (Ps 2 4); RV also, in Ps 16 2, is in doubt, giving "my Lord," possessive, in text and "the Lord" in m. 'Ădhōnāy, as a name of Deity, emphasizes His sovereignty (Ps 2 4; Isa 7 7), and corresponds closely to Kúrios of the NT. It is frequently combined with Jeh (Gen 15 8; Isa 7 7, etc) and with 'Ĕlōhīm (Ps 86 12). Its most significant service in MT is the use of its vowels to point the unpronounceable tetragrammaton יהוה, indicating that the word 'Ădhōnāy should be spoken instead of Yahweh. This combination of vowels and consonants gives the transliteration "Jehovah," adopted by ARV, while the other EV, since Coverdale, represents the combination by the capitals LORD. LXX represents by Kurios.

5. "Jehovah"

The name most distinctive of God as the God of Israel is Jehovah (יְהֹוָה, a combination of the tetragrammaton with the vowels of 'Ădhōnāy, transliterated Yehōwāh, but read by the Hebrews 'ădhōnāy). While both derivation and meaning are lost to us in the uncertainties of its ante-Bib. origin, the following inferences seem to be justified by the facts: (1) This name was common to religions other than Israel's, according to Friedr. Delitzsch, Hommel, Winckler, and Guthe (EB, s.v.), having been found in Bab inscriptions. Ammonite, Arab. and Egyp names appear also to contain it (cf Davidson, OT Theol., 52 f); but while, like Elohim, it was common to primitive Sem religion, it became Israel's distinctive name for the Deity. (2) It was, therefore, not first made known at the call of Moses (Ex 3 13–16; 6 2–8), but, being already known, was at that time given a larger revelation and interpretation: God, to be known to Israel henceforth under the name "Jehovah" and in its fuller significance, was the One sending Moses to deliver Israel; "when I shall say unto them, The God of your fathers hath sent me unto you; and they shall say to me, What is his name? what shall I say unto them? And God said . . . . I WILL BE THAT I WILL BE . . . . say . . . . I WILL BE hath sent me" (Ex 3 13.14 m). The name is assumed as known in the narrative of Gen; it also occurs in pre-Mosaic names (Ex 6 20; 1 Ch 2 25; 7 8). (3) The derivation is from the archaic חוה, ḥāwāh, "to be," better "to become," in Bib. Heb hāyāh; this archaic use of w for y appears also in derivatives of the similar חָיָה, ḥāyāh, "to live," e.g. ḥawwāh in Gen 3 20. (4) It is evident from the interpretative passages (Ex 3; 6) that the form is the fut. of the simple stem (Ḳal) and not fut. of the causative (Hiph'īl) stem in the sense "giver of life"—an idea not borne out by any of the occurrences of the word. The fanciful theory that the word is a combination of the fut., pres. and perfect tenses of the vb., signifying "the One who will be, is, and was," is not to be taken seriously (Stier, etc, in Oehler's OT Theol., in loc.). (5) The meaning may with some confidence be inferred from Origen's transliteration, Iaō, the form in Sam, Iabe, the form as combined in OT names, and the evident signification in Ex 3 and other passages, to be that of the simple fut., יַהְוֶה, yahweh, "he will be." It does not express causation, nor existence in a metaphysical sense, but the covenant promise of the Divine presence, both at the immediate time and in the Messianic age of the future. And thus it became bound up with the Messianic hope, as in the phrase, "the Day of Jehovah," and consequently both it and the LXX tr Kurios were applied by the NT as titles of Christ. (6) It is the personal name of God, as distinguished from such generic or essential names as 'Ēl, 'Ĕlōhīm, Shadday, etc. Characteristic of the OT is its insistence on the possible knowledge of God as a person; and Jehovah is His name as a person. It is illogical, certainly, that the later Hebrews should have shrunk from its pronunciation, in view of the appropriateness of the name and of the OT insistence on the personality of God, who as a person has this name. ARV quite correctly adopts the transliteration "Jehovah" to emphasize its significance and purpose as a personal name of God revealed.

6. "Rock" (Çūr)

Five t in the "Song" of Moses (Dt 32 4.15.18.30.31) the word צוּר, çūr, "Rock," is used as a title of God. It occurs also in the Pss, Isa and poetical passages of other books, and also in proper names, Elizur, Zuriel, etc. Once in AV (Isa 44 8) it is trd "God," but "Rock" in ARV and ARVm. The effort to interpret this title as indicating the animistic origin of OT religion is unnecessary and a pure product of the imagination. It is customary for both OT and NT writers to use descriptive names of God: "rock," "fortress," "shield," "light," "bread," etc, and is in harmony with all the rich figurativeness of the Scriptures; the use of the article in many of the cases cited further corroborates the view that the word is intended to be a descriptive title, not the name of a Nature-deity. It presents the idea of God as stedfast: "The appellation of God as çūr, 'rock,' 'safe retreat,' in Dt refers to this" (Oehler, OT Theol.). It often occurs, in a most striking figure, with the pers. suffix as "my rock," "their rock," to express confidence (Ps 28 1).

7. Ḳādhōsh, "Holy One"

The name (קָדוֹשׁ, ḳādhōsh, "holy") is found frequently in Isa and Pss, and occasionally in the other prophets. It is characteristic of Isa, being found 32 t in that book. It occurs often in the phrase קְדוֹשׁ יִשְׂרָאֵל, ḳedhōsh yisrā'ēl, "Holy One of Israel." The derivation and meaning remain in doubt, but the customary and most probable derivation is from ḳādhash, "to be separate," which best explains its use both of man and of the Deity. When used of God it signifies: (1) His transcendence, His separateness above all other beings, His aloneness as compared to other gods; (2) His peculiar relation to His people Israel unto whom He separated Himself, as He did not unto other nations. In the former sense Isaiah used it of His sole deity (40 25), in the latter of His peculiar and unchanging covenant-relation to Israel (43 3; 48 17), strikingly expressed in the phrase "Holy One of Israel." Ḳādhōsh was rather attributive than personal, but became personal in the use of such absolute theists as Job and Isaiah. It expresses essential Deity, rather than personal revelation.

8. Shadday, "Almighty"

In the patriarchal lit., and in Job particularly, where it is put into the mouths of the patriarchs, this name appears sometimes in the compound אֵל שַׁדַּי, 'ēl shadday, sometimes alone. While its root meaning also is uncertain, the suggested derivation from שָׁדַד, shādhadh, "to destroy," "to terrify," seems most probable, signifying the God who is manifested by the terribleness of His mighty acts. "The Storm God," from שַׁדָּא, shādhā', "to pour out," has been suggested, but is improbable; and even more so the fanciful שֶׁ, she, and דַּי, day, meaning "who is sufficient." Its use in patriarchal days marks an advance over looser Sem conceptions to the stricter monotheistic idea of almightiness, and is in accord with the early consciousness of Deity in race or individual as a God of awe, or even terror. Its monotheistic character is in harmony with its use in the Abrahamic times, and is further corroborated by its ‖ in LXX and NT, παντοκράτωρ, pantokrátōr, "all-powerful."

III. Attributive, or Qualifying Names.—It is often difficult to distinguish between the personal and the attributive names of God, the two divisions necessarily shading into each other. Some of the preceding are really attributive, made personal by usage. The following are the most prominent descriptive or attributive names.

1. 'Ābhīr, "Mighty One"

This name (אָבִיר, 'ābhīr), tr^d in EV "Mighty One," is always combined with Israel or Jacob; its root is אָבַר, 'ābhar, "to be strong," from which is derived the word אֵבֶר, 'ēbher, "pinion," used of the strong wing of the eagle (Isa 40 31), fig. of God in Dt 32 11. It occurs in Jacob's blessing (Gen 49 24), in a prayer for the sanctuary (Ps 132 2.5), and in Isa (1 24; 49 26; 60 16), to express the assurance of the Divine strength in behalf of the oppressed in Israel (Isa 1 24), or in behalf of Israel against his oppressors; it is interesting to note that this name was first used by Jacob himself.

2. 'Ēl-'Ĕlōhē-Israel

The name 'Ēl is combined with a number of descriptive adjs. to represent God in His various attributes; and these by usage have become names or titles of God. For the remarkable phrase 'ĒL-'ĔLŌHĒ-ISRAEL (Gen 33 20), see separate art.

3. 'Elyōn, "Most High"

This name (עֶלְיוֹן, 'elyōn, "highest") is a derivative of עָלָה, 'ālāh, "to go up." It is used of persons or things to indicate their elevation or exaltation: of Israel, favored above other nations (Dt 26 19), of the aqueduct of "the upper pool" (Isa 7 3), etc. This indicates that its meaning when applied to God is the "Exalted One," who is lifted far above all gods and men. It occurs alone (Dt 32 8; Ps 18 13), or in combination with other names of God, most frequently with El (Gen 14 18; Ps 78 35), but also with Jeh (Ps 7 17; 97 9), or with Elohim (Ps 56 2 AV; 78 56). Its early use (Gen 14 18 f) points to a high conception of Deity, an unquestioned monotheism in the beginnings of Heb history.

4. Gibbōr, "Mighty [One]"

The ancient Hebrews were in constant struggle for their land and their liberties, a struggle most intense and patriotic in the heroic days of Saul and David, and in which there was developed a band of men whose great deeds entitled them to the honorable title "mighty men" of valor (גִּבּוֹרִים, gibbōrīm). These were the knights of David's "Round Table." In like manner the Hebrew thought of his God as fighting for him, and easily then this title was applied to God as the Mighty Man of war, occurring in David's psalm of the Ark's Triumphant Entry (Ps 24 8), in the allegory of the Messiah-King (45 3), either alone or combined with El (Isa 9 6; Jer 32 18), and sometimes with Jeh (Isa 42 13).

5. 'Ēl-Rō'ī

When Hagar was fleeing from Sarah's persecutions, Jeh spoke to her in the wilderness of Shur, words of promise and cheer. Whereupon "she called the name of Jeh that spake unto her, Thou art El roi" (Gen 16 13 m). In the text the word רֳאִי, rō'ī, deriv. of rā'āh, "to see," is tr^d "that seeth," lit. "of sight." This is the only occurrence of this title in the OT.

6. Çaddīķ, "Righteous"

One of the covenant attributes of God, His righteousness, is spoken of so often that it passes from adj. to subst., from attribute to name, and He is called "Righteous" (צַדִּיק, çaddīķ), or "the Righteous One." The word is never transliterated but always tr^d in EV, although it might just as properly be considered a Divine name as 'Elyōn or Ķādhōsh. The root צָדַק, çādhaķ, "to be straight" or "right," signifies fidelity to a standard, and is used of God's fidelity to His own nature and to His covenant-promise (Isa 41 10; 42 6; cf Hos 2 19); it occurs alone (Ps 34 17), with El (Dt 32 4), with Elohim (Ezr 9 15; Ps 7 9; 116 5), but most frequently with Jeh (Ps 129 4, etc). In Ex 9 27 Pharaoh, in acknowledging his sin against Jeh, calls Him 'Jeh the Righteous,' using the article. The suggestive combination, "Jeh our Righteousness," is the name given to David's "righteous Branch" (Jer 23 6) and properly should be taken as a proper noun—the name of the Messiah-King.

7. Kannā, "Jealous"

Frequently in the Pent, oftenest in the 3 VSS of the Commandments (Ex 20 5; 34 14; Dt 5 9), God is given the title "Jealous" (קַנָּא, ķannā'), most specifically in the phrase "Jeh, whose name is Jealous" (Ex 34 14). This word, however, did not bear the evil meaning now associated with it in our usage, but rather signified "righteous zeal," Jeh's zeal for His own name or glory (cf Isa 9 7, "the zeal of Jeh," קִנְאָה, ķin'āh; also Zec 1 14; 8 2).

8. Ç^{e}bha'oth, "Lord of Hosts"

Connected with the personal and covenant name Jeh, there is found frequently the word Sabaoth (צְבָאוֹת, ç^{e}bhā'ōth, "hosts"). Invariably in the OT it is tr^d "hosts" (Isa 1 9; Ps 46 7.11, etc), but in the NT it is transliterated twice, both in the Gr and Eng. (Rom 9 29; Jas 5 4). The passage in Rom is a quotation from Isa 1 9 through LXX, which does not translate, but transliterates the Heb. Origin and meaning are uncertain. It is used of heavenly bodies and earthly forces (Gen 2 1); of the army of Israel (2 S 8 16); of the Heavenly beings (Ps 103 21; 148 2; Dnl 4 35). It is probable that the title is intended to include all created agencies and beings, of which Jeh is maker and leader.

9. "I am That I am"

When God appeared to Moses at Sinai, commissioning him to deliver Israel; Moses, being well aware of the difficulty of impressing the people, asked by what name of God he should speak to them: "They shall say to me, What is his name?" Then "God said unto Moses, I AM THAT I AM . . . . say . . . . I AM hath sent me unto you" (Ex 3 14). The name of the Deity given here is similar to Jeh (yahweh) except that the form is not 3d pers. fut., as in the usual form, but the 1st pers. ('ehyeh), since God is here speaking of Himself. The optional reading in ARVm is much to be preferred: "I WILL BE THAT I WILL BE," indicating His covenant pledge to be with and for Israel in all the ages to follow. For further explanation see above, II, 5.

IV. NT Names of God.—The variety of names which characterizes the OT is lacking in the NT, where we are all but limited to two names, each of which corresponds to several in the OT. The most frequent is the name "God" (Θεός, Theós) occurring over 1,000 t, and corresponding to El, Elohim, etc, of the OT. It may, as Elohim, be used by accommodation of heathen gods; but in its true sense it expresses essential Deity, and as expressive of such it is applied to Christ as to the Father (Jn 20 28; Rom 9 5).

2. Kurios, "Lord"

Five t "Lord" is a tr of δεσπότης, despótēs (Lk 2 29; Acts 4 24; 2 Pet 2 1 AV; Jude ver 4; Rev 6 10 AV). In each case there is evident emphasis on sovereignty and correspondence to the 'Ādhōn of the OT. The most common Gr word for Lord is Κύριος, Kúrios, representing both Jeh and 'Adhonai of the OT, and occurring upwards of 600 t. Its use for Jeh was in the spirit of both the Heb scribes, who pointed the consonants of the covenant name with the vowels of Adhonay, the title of dominion, and of the LXX, which rendered this combination as Kurios. Consequently quotations from the OT in which Jeh occurs are rendered by Kurios. It is applied to Christ equally with the Father and the Spirit, showing that the Messianic hopes conveyed by the name Jeh were for NT writers fulfilled in Jesus Christ; and that in Him the long hoped-for appearance of Jeh was realized.

3. Descriptive and Figurative Names

As in the OT, so in the NT various attributive, descriptive or fig. names are found, often corresponding to those in the OT. Some of these are: The "Highest" or "Most High" (ὕψιστος, húpsistos), found in this sense only in Lk (1 32.35.76; 2 14, etc), and equivalent to Elyon (see III, 3, above); "Almighty," Παντοκράτωρ, Pantokrátōr (2 Cor 6 18; Rev 1 8, etc), corresponding to Shadday (see II, 8 above; see also ALMIGHTY); "Father," as in the Lord's Prayer, and elsewhere (Mt 6 9; 11 25; Jn 17 25; 2 Cor 6 18); "King" (1 Tim 1 17); "King of kings" (1 Tim 6 15); "King of kings," "Lord of lords" (Rev 17 14; 19 16); "Potentate" (1 Tim 6 15); "Master" (kurios, Eph 6 9; 2 Pet 2 1; Rev 6 10); "Shepherd," "Bishop" (1 Pet 2 25).

LITERATURE.—Theology of OT by various authors: Oehler, Schultz, Davidson; Delitzsch, Psychology of the OT; H. P. Smith, "Theophorous Names of OT" in OT and Sem Studies; Gray, HPN; "God" in HDB and EB.

EDWARD MACK

GOD, SON (SONS) OF. See SONS OF GOD (OT); SONS OF GOD (NT).

GOD, THE FATHER. See FATHER, GOD THE.

GOD, THE UNKNOWN. See UNKNOWN.

GODDESS, god'es (אֱלֹהִים, 'ĕlōhīm, θεά, theá): There is no separate word for "goddess" in the OT. In the only instance in which the word occurs in EV (1 K 11 5.33), the gender is determined by the noun—"Ashtoreth, the god [goddess] of the Sidonians." In the NT the term is applied to Diana of Ephesus (Acts 19 27.35.37).

GODHEAD, god'hed: The word "Godhead" is a simple doublet of the less frequently occurring "Godhood." Both forms stand side by side in the Ancren Riwle (about 1225 AD), and both have survived until today, though not in equally common use. They are representatives of a large class of abstract substs., formed with the suffix -head or -hood, most of which formerly occurred in both forms almost indifferently, though the majority of them survive only, or very preponderatingly (except in Scottish speech), in the form -hood. The two suffixes appear in Middle Eng. as -hêde and -hôd, and presuppose in the Anglo-Saxon which lies behind them a fem. haéda (which is not actually known) by the side of the masc. hád. The Anglo-Saxon word "was originally a distinct subst., meaning 'person, personality, sex, condition, quality, rank'" (Bradley, in A New Eng. Dict. on a Historical Basis, s.v. "-hood"), but its use as a suffix early superseded its separate employment. At first -hêde appears to have been appropriated to adjs., -hôd to substs.; but, this distinction breaking down and the forms coming into indiscriminate use, -hêde grew obsolete, and remains in common use only in one or two special forms, such as "Godhead," "maidenhead" (Bradley, as cited, s.v. "-head").

The general elimination of the forms in -head has been followed by a fading consciousness, in the case of the few surviving instances in this form, of the qualitative sense inherent in the suffix. The words accordingly show a tendency to become simple denotatives. Thus "the Godhead" is frequently employed merely as a somewhat strong synonym of "God," although usually with more or less emphasis upon that in God which makes Him God. One of its established usages is to denote the Divine essence as such, in distinction from the three "hypostases" or "persons" which share its common possession in the doctrine of the Trinity. This usage is old: Bradley (op. cit.) is able to adduce instances from the 13th cent. In this usage the word has long held the rank of a technical term, e.g. the Thirty-Nine Articles of the Church of England, 1571, Art. I: "And in the unitie of this Godhead, there be three persons" (cf the Irish Articles of 1615, and the Westminster Confession, II, 3); Westminster Shorter Catechism, Q. 6: "There are three persons in the Godhead." Pursuant to the fading of the qualitative sense of the word, there has arisen a tendency, when the qualitative consciousness is vivid, to revive the obsolescent "Godhood," to take its place; and this tendency naturally shows itself esp. when the contrast with humanity is expressed. Carlyle, for example (French Revolution, III, Book vi, ch iv, § 1), speaking of the posthumous reaction against Marat, writes: "Shorter godhood had no divine man"; and Phillips Brooks (Sermons, XIII, 237) speaks of Christ bridging the gulf "between the Godhood and the manhood." "Godhood" seems, indeed, always to have had a tendency to appear in such contrasts, as if the qualitative consciousness were more active in it than in "Godhead." Thus it seems formerly to have suggested itself almost as inevitably to designate the Divine nature of Christ, as "Godhead" did to designate the common Divine essence of the Trinity. Bradley cites instances from 1563 down.

The fundamental meaning of "Godhead" is, nevertheless, no less than that of "Godhood," the state, dignity, condition, quality, of a god, or, as monotheists would say, of God. As manhood is that which makes a man a man, and childhood that which makes a child a child, so Godhead is that which makes God, God. When we ascribe Godhead to a being, therefore, we affirm that all that enters into the idea of God belongs to Him. "Godhead" is thus the Saxon equivalent of the Lat "Divinity," or, as it is now becoming more usual to say, "Deity." Like these terms it is rendered concrete by prefixing the article to it. As "the Divinity," "the Deity," so also "the Godhead" is only another way of saying "God," except that when we say "the Divinity," "the Deity," "the Godhead," we are saying "God" more abstractly and more qualitatively, that is with more emphasis, or at least with a more lively consciousness, of the constitutive qualities which make God the kind of being we call "God."

The word "Godhead" occurs in AV only 3 t (Acts 17 29; Rom 1 20; Col 2 9), and oddly enough it translates in these 3 passages, 3 different, though closely related, Gr words, tó theíon (τὸ θεῖον), theiótēs (θειότης), theótēs (θεότης).

To theion means "that which is Divine," concretely, or, shortly, "the Deity." Among the Greeks it was in constant use in the sense of "the Divine Being," and particularly as a general term to designate the Deity apart from reference to a particular god. It is used by Paul (Acts 17 29) in an address made to a heathen audience, and is inserted into a context in which it is flanked by the simple term "God" (ho theós, ὁ θεός) on both sides. It is obviously deliberately chosen in order to throw up into emphasis the qualitative idea of God; and this emphasis is still further heightened by the direct contrast into which it is brought with the term "man." "Being, then, the offspring of God, we ought not to think that it is to gold or silver or stone graven by art and device of man that the Godhead is like." In an effort to bring out this qualitative emphasis, RVm suggests that we might substitute for "the Godhead" here the periphrastic rendering, "that which is Divine." But this seems both clumsy and ineffective for its purpose. From the philological standpoint, "the Godhead" is a very fair equivalent for to theion, differing as it does from the simple "God" precisely by its qualitative emphasis. It may be doubted, however, whether in the partial loss by "Godhead" of its qualitative force in its current usage, one of its synonyms, "the Divinity" (which is the rendering here of the Rhemish version) or "the Deity," would not better convey Paul's emphasis to modern readers.

Neither of these terms, "Divinity," "Deity," occurs anywhere in AV, and "Deity" does not occur in RV either; but RV (following the Rhemish version) substitutes "Divinity" for "Godhead" in Rom 1 20. Of the two, "Divinity" was originally of the broader connotation; in the days of heathendom it was applicable to all grades of Divine beings. "Deity" was introduced by the Christian Fathers for the express purpose of providing a stronger word by means of which the uniqueness of the Christians' God should be emphasized. Perhaps "Divinity" retains even in its Eng. usage something of its traditional weaker connotation, although, of course, in a monotheistic consciousness the two terms coalesce in meaning. There exists a tendency to insist, therefore, on the "Deity" of Christ, rather than his mere "Divinity," in the feeling that "Divinity" might lend itself to the notion that Christ possessed but a secondary or reduced grade of Divine quality. In Acts 17 29 Paul is not discriminating between grades of Divinity, but is preaching monotheism. In this context, then, to theion does not lump together "all that is called God or is worshipped," and declare that all that is in any sense Divine should be esteemed beyond the power of material things worthily to represent. Paul has the idea of God at its height before his mind, and having quickened his hearers' sense of God's exaltation by his elevated description of Him, he demands of them whether this Deity can be fitly represented by any art of man working in dead stuff. He uses the term to theion, rather than ho theos, not merely in courteous adoption of his hearers' own language, but because of its qualitative emphasis. On the whole, the best Eng. tr of it would probably be "the Deity." "The Godhead" has ceased to be sufficiently qualitative: "the Godhood" is not sufficiently current: "the Divine" is not sufficiently personal: "the Divinity" is perhaps not sufficiently strong: "Deity" without the article loses too much of its personal reference to compensate for the gain in qualitativeness: "the Deity" alone seems fairly to reproduce the apostle's thought.

The Gr term in Rom 1 20 is theiotēs, which again, as a term of quality, is not unfairly rendered by "Godhead." What Paul says here is that "the everlasting power and Godhead" of God "are clearly perceived by means of His works." By "Godhead" he clearly means the whole of that by which God is constituted what we mean by "God." By coupling the word with "power," Paul no doubt intimates that his mind is resting esp. upon those qualities which enter most intimately into and constitute the exaltation of God; but we must beware of limiting the connotation of the term—all of God's attributes are glorious. The context shows that the thought of the apostle was moving on much the same lines as in Acts 17 29; here, too, the contrast which determines the emphasis is with "corruptible man," and along with him, with the lower creatures in general (ver 23). How could man think of the Godhead under such similitudes—the Godhead, so clearly manifested in its glory by its works! The substitution for "Godhead" here of its synonym "Divinity" by RV is doubtless due in part to a desire to give distinctive renderings to distinct terms, and in part to a wish to emphasize, more strongly than "Godhead" in its modern usage emphasizes, the qualitative implication which is so strong in theiotēs. Perhaps, however, the substitution is not altogether felicitous. "Divinity," in its contrast with "Deity," may have a certain weakness of connotation clinging to it, which would unsuit it to represent theiotēs here. It is quite true that the two terms, "Divinity" and "Deity," are the representatives in Lat Patristic writers respectively of the Gr theiotēs and theotēs. Augustine (The City of God, VII, 1; cf X, 1) tells us that "Deity" was coined by Christian writers as a more accurate rendering of the Gr theotēs than the current "Divinity." But it does not follow that because "Deity" more accurately renders theotēs, therefore "Divinity" is always the best rendering of theiotēs. The stress laid by the Gr Fathers on the employment of theotēs to express the "Deity" of the Persons of the Trinity was in sequence to attempts which were being made to ascribe to the Son and the Spirit a reduced "Divinity"; and it was the need the Lat Fathers felt in the same interests which led them to coin "Deity" as a more accurate rendering, as they say, of theotēs. Meanwhile theiotēs and "Divinity" had done service in the two languages, the former as practically, and the latter as absolutely, the only term in use to express the idea of "Deity." Theotēs is very rare in classical Gr, "Deity" non-existent in classical Lat. To represent theiotēs uniformly by "Divinity," if any reduced connotation at all clings to "Divinity," would therefore be to represent it often very inadequately. And that is the case in the present passage. What Paul says is clearly made known by God's works, is His everlasting power and all the other everlasting attributes which form His Godhead and constitute His glory.

It is theotēs which occurs in Col 2 9. Here Paul declares that "all the fulness of the Godhead" dwells in Christ "bodily." The phrase "fulness of the Godhead" is an esp. emphatic one. It means everything without exception which goes to make up the Godhead, the totality of all that enters into the conception of Godhood. All this, says Paul, dwells in Christ "bodily," that is after such a fashion as to be manifested in connection with a bodily organism. This is the distinction of Christ: in the Father and in the Spirit the whole plenitude of the Godhead dwells also, but not "bodily"; in them it is not manifested in connection with a bodily life. It is the incarnation which Paul has in mind; and he tells us that in the incarnate Son, the fulness of the Godhead dwells. The term chosen to express the Godhead here is the strongest and the most unambiguously decisive which the language affords.

Theiotēs may mean all that theotēs can mean; on monotheistic lips it does mean just what theotēs means; but theotēs must mean the utmost that either term can mean. The distinction is, not that theotēs refers to the essence and theiotēs to the attributes; we cannot separate the essence and the attributes. Where the essence is, there the attributes are; they are merely the determinants of the essence. And where the attributes are, there the essence is; it is merely the thing, of the kind of which they are the determinants. The distinction is that theotēs emphasizes that it is the highest stretch of Divinity which is in question, while theiotēs might possibly be taken as referring to Deity at a lower level. It it not merely such divinity as is shared by all the gods many and lords many of the heathen world, to which "heroes" might aspire, and "demons" attain, all the plenitude of which dwells in Christ as incarnate; but that Deity which is peculiar to the high gods, or, since Paul is writing out of a monotheistic consciousness, that Deity which is the Supreme God alone. All the fulness of supreme Deity dwells in Christ bodily. There is nothing in the God who is over all which is not in Christ. Probably no better rendering of this idea is afforded by our modern Eng. than the term "Godhead," in which the qualitative notion still lurks, though somewhat obscured behind the individualizing implication, and which in any event emphasizes precisely what Paul wishes here to assert—that all that enters into the conception of God, and makes God what we mean by the term "God," dwells in Christ, and is manifested in Him in connection with a bodily organism. GODLESS, god′les: This word is not found in the text of AV. It is found, however, in Apoc (2 Macc 7 34, "O godless [RV "unholy"] man"). RV substitutes the word "godless" for the word "hypocrite" in the following passages: Job 8 13; 13 16; 15 34; 17 8; 20 5; 27 8; 34 30; 36 13; Prov 11 9; Isa 33 14. RV does not seem to be consistent in carrying out the idea of "godless" for "hypocrite," for in Isa 9 17; 10 6; Ps 35 16 this same Heb word ḥānēph is tr^d "profane." The principal idea lying at the root of the word is that of pollution and profanity; a condition of not merely being without God but assuming an attitude of open and blatant opposition toward God. The godless man is not merely the atheistic, unbelieving or even irreligious, but the openly impious, wicked and profane man. Indeed it can hardly be rightly claimed that the idea of hypocrisy is involved in the meaning of the word, for the "godless" man is not the one who professes one thing and lives another, but the one who openly avows not only his disbelief in, but his open opposition to, God. Doubtless the idea of pollution and defilement is also to be included in the definition of this word; see Jer 3 9; Nu 35 33; Dnl 11 31. WILLIAM EVANS

GODLINESS, god′li-nes, GODLY, god′li (εὐσέβεια, eusébeia, εὐσεβής, -ῶς, eusebḗs, -ōs): In the OT the word rendered "godly" in Ps 4 3; 32 6 (חָסִיד, ḥāṣīdh) is lit. "kind," then "pious" (RVm renders it in the former passage, "one that he favoreth"). Sometimes in both the OT and the NT a periphrasis is employed, "of God," "according to God" (e.g. "godly sorrow," 2 Cor 7 10). Godliness, as denoting character and conduct determined by the principle of love or fear of God in the heart, is the summing up of genuine religion. There can be no true religion without it: only a dead "form" (2 Tim 3 5). The term is a favorite one in the Pastoral Epistles. The incarnation is "the mystery of godliness" (1 Tim 3 16). GODS (אֱלֹהִים, 'ĕlōhīm; θεοί, theoí):

I. IN THE OT
    1. Superhuman Beings (God and Angels)
    2. Judges, Rulers
    3. Gods of the Nations
    4. Superiority of Jehovah to Other Gods
    5. Regulations Regarding the Gods of the Nations
    6. Israel's Tendency to Idolatry
II. IN THE APOC
III. IN THE NT

The Heb pl. 'ĕlōhīm is generally known as the pl. of "majesty" and is the ordinary name for God. The meaning of the pl. seems to be "plenitude of powers." It denotes the fulness of those attributes of power which belonged to the Divine Being. Thus it is usually tr^d in the sing., "God," when referring to the God of Israel. When reference is made to the gods of the other nations the word is tr^d in the pl., "gods." The heathen nations usually had a plurality of gods. Among the Semites it was customary for one nation or tribe to have its own particular god. Often there were many tribes, or families, or communities, in one nation, each having a particular god. Thus even among Semites a nation may have many gods and be polytheistic. Among the other nations, Iranian, Hamitic, etc, there were always a number of deities, sometimes a multitude. There are many references to these in the OT. In a few cases where the pl. is used, the sing. would be better, e.g. Gen 3 5 AV; Ex 32 4.8.23; Ruth 1 15 AV; Jgs 17 5; 18 24; 1 S 17 43. This, however, might be disputed.

1. Superhuman Beings Including God and Angels

I. In the OT.—The following are the more important usages of the word in the OT: The tr of Ps 8 5 is disputed. LXX and AV translate it "angels," RV and ARV, "God," with "angels" in the margin. The Epistle to the He has the word "angels." This seems to be more in keeping with the OT ideas of the relation between God, men and angels. Gen 1 26 has the pl. "us," but it is not certain to whom it refers, most probably to the angels or mighty ones which surrounded the throne of God as servants or counsellors; cf Job 38 7, and see SONS OF GOD. In Ps 97 7 the expression "worship him, all ye gods," may possibly refer to the gods of the nations, but more probably to the angels or mighty ones.

2. Judges, Rulers

Judges, rulers, are regarded "either as Divine representatives at sacred places, or as reflecting Divine majesty and power" (see BDB, s.v.). Ex 21 6 might better be tr^d as in the margin, "the judges." These were men appointed to represent God and adjudicate on important matters of law. LXX has "Criterion of God." In Ex 22 8 the word is used in the same sense, and ver 9 would also be better tr^d "the judges"; ver 28 likewise. See also 1 S 2 25; Ps 82 1.6, where the reference is to those who act as judges.

3. Gods of the Nations as Objects of Worship

(1) The ancestors of Israel "beyond the River" had their gods (Josh 24 14 f). While there is no mention of idolatry before the Deluge, the ancestors and kindred of Abraham were idolaters. Ur of the Chaldees was the center for the worship of Sin, the Moon-god. Many others were worshipped in the various cities of Babylon. See BABYLONIA.

(2) The gods of Laban and his family (Gen 31 30.32; 35 2.4) were household gods or t^{e}rāphīm, and were stolen by Rachel and carried off in her flight with Jacob. See TERAPHIM.

(3) Gods of Egypt: For many centuries before the time of Abraham there had been numerous objects of worship in Egypt. Many of these were animals, birds and natural objects. Horus, the hawk, was one of the earliest of all. The cat, the bull, etc, were worshipped at times. The plagues of Egypt were specially directed against these wretched deities (Nu 33 4; Ex 12 12). Jeh took vengeance on all the gods of Egypt. These terrible events showed that "Jeh is greater than all gods" (18 11). He redeemed His people from the nations and its gods (2 S 7 23). Jeremiah predicted the time when Jeh should destroy the gods of Egypt (Jer 43 12 f; 46 25).

(4) Of the gods of the Amorites (Jgs 6 10) no names are given, but they probably were the same as the gods of the Canaanites.

(5) The gods of the Canaanites were Nature-gods, and their worship was that of the productive and chiefly reproductive powers of Nature. Their service was perhaps the most immoral and degrading of all. The high places and altars of the different Baals, Ashtoreths, etc, were numerous throughout Canaan. These deities were always represented by images and Moses makes frequent reference to them with warnings against this seductive worship (Dt 7 25; 12 3.30.31; 13 7; 20 18; 29 18; 32 16, etc). See also Idolatry; Baal; Ashtoreth; Asherah, etc.

(6) Gods of the Philis: The champion Goliath cursed David by his gods (1 S 17 43). Perhaps it would be better rendered "god." Saul's and his son's armor was put into the house of their gods (1 Ch 10 10). See also Dagon; Baalzebub.

(7) The two golden calves erected by Jeroboam at Dan and Bethel to keep the people from going to Jerus to worship are called gods (1 K 12 28; 2 Ch 13 8 f). See Calf, Golden.

(8) The gods of Damascus: Ben-hadad was accustomed to worship in the house of the god Rimmon (2 K 5 18). No other names are mentioned, but from 2 Ch 28 23 it is clear that there were many gods in Syria. See Rimmon.

(9) Solomon's many wives worshipped their own gods, and he provided the means for their worship. Chief among these were Chemosh of Moab and Molech of Ammon (1 K 11 2.4.8). See Chemosh; Molech.

(10) The mixed peoples transplanted into Samaria by Sargon had their various gods and mingled their service with that of Jeh, after being taught by a priest of Jeh. The names of some of these gods were Succoth-benoth, Nergal, Ashima, Nibhaz, Tartak, Adrammelech (2 K 17 29.30.31.33). See separate articles.

(11) Of the gods of Seir, which were brought to Jerus by Amaziah, the names are not given (2 Ch 25 14).

(12) The gods of the nations conquered by Sennacherib and his fathers, viz. Hamoth, Arpad, Sepharvaim, Hena, Ivvah (2 K 18 33–35; 19 13). Also those conquered by Sennacherib's fathers, Gozan, Haran, Rezeph, Eden or Telassar (2 K 19 12; Isa 36 18.19.20; 2 Ch 32 13 f).

(13) Gods of Moab are mentioned in Ruth 1 15; 1 K 11 1.7. Possibly Ruth 1 15 should be tr^{d} "god." See Chemosh.

(14) Gods of Babylon: The graven images of her gods referred to in Isa 21 9; 42 17; Bel and Nebo mentioned in Isa 46 1; other gods of silver and gold (Ezr 1 7; Dnl 4 8.9.18; 5 4.11.14.23).

(15) Nineveh's gods are merely referred to in Nah 1 14. Sennacherib was worshipping in the house of Nisroch his god when slain by his sons (2 K 19 37).

(16) The coastlands or borders and peninsulas of the Aegean Sea had numerous idol gods, shrines and devotees. Isaiah challenges them to prove that they are gods (Isa 41 22 f).

4. The Superiority of Jehovah to Other Gods

Jeh was "greater than all gods" (Ex 15 11; 18 11); "God of gods, and Lord of lords" (Dt 10 14. 17); "The Mighty One" (Josh 22 22); "to be feared above all gods" (1 Ch 16 25; 2 Ch 2 5; Ps 96 4 f); "King above all gods" (Ps 95 3; 97 7.9; 86 8; 135 5; 136 2; 138 1; Jer 10 11; Zeph 2 11; Dnl 2 18.47). Jeremiah advances so far toward a pure and well-defined monotheism that he speaks of all other gods as "not gods." They have no existence to him (Jer 2 11; 5 7; 16 20). A similar position is taken in Isa 41, 43, etc.

5. Regulations Regarding the Gods of the Nations

The laws of Moses give no uncertain sound concerning them. The Decalogue begins: "Thou shalt have no other gods before me." Whatever may be the exact meaning of this, it is perfectly clear that Israel was to have nothing to do with any God but Jeh (Ex 20 3; Dt 5 7). No images shall be made of them (Ex 20 4.23; 34 17; Lev 19 4; Dt 5 8 f). No mention shall be made of them (Ex 23 13; Josh 23 7). They are not to be worshipped but destroyed (Ex 23 24). They are to make no covenant with the people or their gods would be a snare to them (Ex 23 32; Dt 6 14; 7 4.25). A curse will follow any defection from Jeh to them (Dt 11 28; 28 14 ff; 12 3.30; 13 7; 20 18; 29 17). These gods are an abomination to Jeh (Dt 12 31; 20 18; 29 17; 32 37; Ezk 7 20; 1 K 11 5; 2 K 23 13). They are to be as foreign gods to Israel (1 S 7 3 f; Josh 24 20.23; Jgs 10 16; 2 Ch 14 3; 33 15).

6. Israel's Tendency to Go after Other Gods

The constant tendency of Israel to go after other gods was first made manifest at Sinai (Ex 32 1.4.8. 23.31; 34 15). Hosea says (11 2), "The more the prophets called them, the more they went from them." Ezekiel declares (16 3), "The Amorite was thy father, and thy mother was a Hittite," referring doubtless to the idolatrous taint in the blood of Israel. The tendency manifested itself also at Baal-peor where Israel was led into the licentious rites of the Moabites (Nu 25 2 f). Moses saw the taint in the blood, foresaw the danger and repeatedly warned them (Dt 17 3; 18 20; 29 26; 30 17; 31 18). Perhaps the most striking passages in Dt are chs 13, 28, 30, where are pictured the consequences of going after other gods. Joshua also warns them (23 7), and the history of the period of the Judges is the story of their periodical defection from Jeh and the punishment resulting therefrom (Jgs 2 12.17.19; 5 8; 10 6 f; 1 S 8 8). Solomon himself gave an impetus in that direction (1 K 11 5–8). After the disruption, the religion of the Northern Kingdom became very corrupt (1 K 14 9; 2 Ch 13 8 f). The golden calves of Jeroboam opened the door for an inrush of idols and other gods. Ahab's marriage to Jezebel threatened to wipe out Jeh-worship and substitute Baal-worship, and, but for the powerful ministry of Elijah and Elisha, might have effected such a result. Partly checked for a time, the evil broke out in other forms, and even the preaching of Amos and Hosea failed to turn the tide of idolatry. The result was the destruction of the kingdom (2 K 17 7 ff; Jer 3 6–8; 1 Ch 5 25). The Southern Kingdom fared better. Other gods were countenanced by Rehoboam, Abijah, Athaliah, Jehoram, Ahaz, Amon, Manasseh, Jehoiakim, etc. Reform movements were attempted by Asa, Jehoshaphat, Hezekiah and Josiah, but did not wholly avail. In the reign of Manasseh the nation plunged into the worship of other gods. The ministries of Isaiah, Jeremiah, etc, availed not to stop the tide (2 Ch 34 25; Jer 11 13; 5 19; 2 K 22 17; Jer 1 16; 19 4; 7 6; 13 10; 16 11; 44 5.8). The nation was carried into exile because of its going after other gods (2 K 22 17; Dt 29 25 f). The captivity had its desired effect. The Israel that returned and perpetuated the nation never again lapsed into the worship of other gods.

II. In the Apocrypha.—The Apoc reiterates much of the OT teaching: the defection of Israel (2 Esd 1 6); the gods of the nations (Jth 3 8; 8 18); the gods which their fathers worshipped (5 7 f); the sin of Israel (Ad Est 14 7). The Book of Wisd refers to the "creatures which they supposed to be gods" (12 27; 13 2.3.10; 15 15). Mention is made of the gods of Babylon (Bar 1 22; 6 6–57 passim; Bel 1 27).

III. In the NT.—The expression "gods" occurs in six places in the NT: (1) Jesus, in reply to the Pharisees, who questioned His right to call Himself the son of God, quoted Ps 82 6: "I said, Ye are gods." He argues from this that if God Himself called them gods to whom the word of God came, i.e. the judges who acted as representatives of God in a judicial capacity, could not He who had been sanctified and sent into the world justly call Himself the Son of God? It was an argumentum ad hominem (Jn 10 34–37). (2) When Paul and Barnabas preached the gospel in Lystra they healed a certain man who had been a cripple from birth. The Lycaonians, seeing the miracle, cried out in their own dialect, "The gods are come down to us in the likeness of men. And they called Barnabas, Jupiter; and Paul, Mercury" (Acts 14 11 f). Their ascription of deity to the apostles in such times shows their familiarity with the Gr pantheon. (3) As Paul preached Jesus and the resurrection at Athens the people said he seemed to be a setter forth of strange gods. The conception of only one God seemed to be wholly foreign to them (Acts 17 18). (4) In 1 Cor 8 5 Paul speaks of "gods many, and lords many," but the context shows that he did not believe in the existence of any god but one; "We know that no idol is anything in the world." (5) While at Ephesus, Paul was said to have "persuaded and turned away much people, saying that they are no gods, that are made with hands" (Acts 19 26). (6) The Galatians had been "in bondage to them that by nature are no gods" (Gal 4 8). Indirect references are also found in Acts 17 16, where Paul observed the city full of idols. Likewise in Rom 1 22 f.25 ff. Paul refers to the numerous gods of the heathen world. These were idols, birds, four-footed beasts and creeping things. The results of this degrading worship are shown in the ver following. See also IDOLATRY; GOD, NAMES OF.

J. J. REEVE

GOD(S), STRANGE, strānj: The word "strange," as used in this connection in the OT, refers to the fact that the god or gods do not belong to Israel, but are the gods which are worshipped by other families or nations. In several cases a more exact tr would give us the "gods of the stranger" or foreigner. So in Gen 35 2.4; Josh 24 2; Jgs 10 16; Dt 31 16; 32 12, etc. In a few passages like Dt 32 16; Ps 44 20; 81 9; Isa 43 12, the word is an adj., but the idea is the same: the gods are those which are worshipped by other peoples and hence are forbidden to Israel, which is under obligation to worship Yahweh alone (cf 2 Esd 1 6).

In the NT the phrase occurs only once, in the account of Paul's experiences in Athens (Acts 17 18), when some of his auditors said, "He seemeth to be a setter forth of strange gods" (ξένα δαιμόνια, xéna daimónia). Here the thought is clearly that by his preaching of Jesus he was regarded as introducing a new divinity, that is one who was strange or foreign to the Athenians and of whom they had never heard before. Like the Romans of this period the Athenians were doubtless interested in, and more or less favorable to, the numerous new cults which were coming to their attention as the result of the constant intercourse with the Orient. See preceding article.

WALTER R. BETTERIDGE

GODSPEED, god′spēd (χαίρω, chaírō): "Godspeed" occurs only in 2 Jn vs 10.11 AV as the tr of chaírein, the infin. of chairō, and is rendered in RV "greeting." It means "rejoice," "be of good cheer," "be it well with thee"; chaíre, chaírete, chaírein, were common forms of greeting, expressive of good-will and desire for the person's prosperity, tr^{d} in the Gospels, "Hail!" "All Hail!" (Mt 26 49; 27 29; 28 9, etc); chaírein is the LXX for shālōm (Isa 48 22; 57 21; cf 2 Macc 1 10). "Godspeed" first appears in Tindale's version; Wyclif had "heil!" Rheims, "God save you."

In the passage cited Christians are forbidden thus to salute false teachers who might come to them. The injunction does not imply any breach of charity, since it would not be right to wish anyone success in advocating what was believed to be false and harmful. We should be sincere in our greetings; formal courtesy must yield to truth, still courteously, however, and in the spirit of love.

GOEL, gō′el (גֹּאֵל, gō'ēl, "redeemer"): Goel is the participle of the Heb word gā'al ("to deliver," "to redeem") which aside from its common usage is frequently employed in connection with Heb law, where it is the technical term applied to a person who as the nearest relative of another is placed under certain obligations to him. (1) If a Jew because of poverty had been obliged to sell himself to a wealthy "stranger or sojourner," it became the duty of his relatives to redeem him. Cf Lev 25 47 ff and the art. JUBILEE. (2) The same duty fell upon the nearest kinsman, if his brother, being poor, had been forced to sell some of his property. Cf Lev 25 23 ff; Ruth 4 4 ff, and the art. JUBILEE. (3) It also devolved upon the nearest relative to marry the childless widow of his brother (Ruth 3 13; Tob 3 17). (4) In Nu 5 5 ff a law is stated which demands that restitution be made to the nearest relative, and after him to the priest, if the injured party has died (Lev 6 1 ff). (5) The law of blood-revenge (Blut-Rache) made it the sacred duty of the nearest relative to avenge the blood of his kinsman. He was called the gō'ēl ha-dām (גֹּאֵל הַדָּם), "the avenger of blood." This law was based upon the command given in Gen 9 5 f: "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed," and was carried out even if an animal had killed a man; in this case, however, the payment of a ransom was permitted (Ex 21 28 ff). A clear distinction was made between an accidental and a deliberate murder. In both cases the murderer could find refuge at the altar of the sanctuary; if, however, the investigation revealed presumptuous manslaughter, he was taken from the altar to be put to death (Ex 21 12 ff; 1 K 1 50; 2 28). In Nu 35 9 ff definite regulations as to the duties of the Goel are given. Six cities were to be appointed as "cities of refuge," three on each side of the Jordan. The congregation has judgment over the murderer. There must be more than one witness to convict a man. If he is found guilty, he is delivered to the Goel; if murder was committed by accident he is permitted to live within the border of the city of refuge; in case the manslayer leaves this city before the death of the high priest, the avenger of blood has a right to slay him. After the death of the high priest the murderer may return to his own city. Ransom cannot be given for the life of a murderer; no expiation can be made for a murder but by the blood of the murderer (Dt 19 4 ff; Josh 20; 2 S 14 6 ff). According to the law the children of a murderer could not be held responsible for the crime of their father (Dt 24 16; 2 K 14 6), but see 2 S 21 1 ff. The order in which the nearest relative was considered the Goel is given in Lev 25 48 f: first a brother, then an uncle or an uncle's son, and after them any other near relative. This order was observed in connection with (1) above, but probably also in the other cases except (4).

For the figurative use of Goel ("redeemer") see Ps 119 154; Prov 23 11; Job 19 25; Isa 41 14*b. See also Avenge; Murder; Refuge, Cities of.

GOG, gog (גּוֹג, gōgh; Γούγ, Goúg):

(1) A son of Joel, and descendant of the tribe of Reuben (1 Ch 5 4).

(2) The prince of Rosh, Meshech and Tubal (Ezk 38 2 f; 39 1–16). His territory was known as the land of Magog, and he was the chief of those northern hordes who were to make a final onslaught upon Israel while enjoying the blessings of the Messianic age. He has been identified with Gagi, ruler of Sakhi, mentioned by Asshurbanipal, but Professor Sayce thinks the Heb name corresponds more closely to Gyges, the Lydian king, the Gugu of the cuneiform inscriptions. According to Ezekiel's account Gog's army included in its numbers Persia, Cush, Put, Gomer or the Cimmerians, and Togarmah, from the extreme N. They are represented as a vast mixed horde from the far-off parts of the N., the limits of the horizon, completely armed and equipped for war. They were to come upon the mountains of Israel and cover the land like a cloud. Their purpose is plunder, for the people of Israel are rich and dwell in towns and villages without walls. His coming, which had been prophesied by the seers of Israel, shall be accompanied by a theophany and great convulsions in Nature. A panic shall seize the hosts of Gog, rain, hailstones, pestilence, fire and brimstone shall consume them. Their bodies shall be food for the birds, their weapons shall serve as firewood for seven years and their bones shall be buried E. of the Jordan in Hamon-gog and thus not defile the holy land. The fulfilment of this strange prophecy can never be literal. In general it seems to refer to the last and desperate attempts of a dying heathenism to overturn the true religion of Jeh, or make capital out of it, profiting by its great advantages.

(3) In Rev 20 7 Satan is let loose and goes to the four corners of the earth, Gog and Magog, to muster his hosts for the final struggle against God. In Ezk the invasion of Gog occurs during the Messianic age, while in Rev it occurs just at the close of the millennium. In Ezk Gog and Magog are gathered by Jeh for their destruction; in Rev they are gathered by Satan. In both cases the number is vast, the destruction is by supernatural means, and is complete and final. See Magog.

GOIIM, gōi′yim (גּוֹיִם, gōyim): This word, rendered in AV "nations," "heathen," "Gentiles," is commonly trd simply "nations" in RV. In Gen 14 1 where AV has "Tidal, king of nations," RV retains in the text the Heb "Goiim" as a proper name. Some identify with Gutium. The Heb word is similarly retained in Josh 12 23.

GOING, gō′ing, GOINGS, gō′ingz: Besides, occasionally, forms of the common words for "go" (see Go), for "going" and "goings," the Heb has אַשֻּׁר, 'ashshur ('ăshūr, 'āshūr), "step," מוֹצָא, mōçā', תּוֹצָאוֹת, tōçā'ōth, "goings out," "outgoings." The word "goings" is sometimes used lit., as in Nu 33 2, "Moses wrote their goings out" (Heb mōçā'). "Going up," ma'ăleh, is in many passages rendered in RV (as in Nu 34 4; 2 S 15 30 AV) "ascent," as e.g. Josh 15 7; Jgs 1 36; Neh 12 37 (ARV only). In Ezk 44 5, ARV substitutes "egress" (way out or place of exit) for "going forth." "The goings out [place of exit; hence, boundary] of it" (Nu 34 4.5.9.12 AV) occurs frequently. The verbal forms bō', mābhō', also mē'āl (Dnl 6 14), are used of the sunset, "the going down of the sun." Thus Josh 8 29 RV, AV "as soon as the sun was down."

In the NT, RV substitutes "going out" for "gone out" (sbénnumi) (Mt 25 8); "going up" for "ascending" (Lk 19 28); "going in" for "coming in" (Acts 9 28); "going about" for "wandering" (1 Tim 5 13); "seeking" for "going about" (Rom 10 3).

Metaphorically: "Goings" is used for a man's ways or conduct (Ps 17 5, RV "steps"; 40 2; Prov 14 15, etc). In Ps 17 5 "Hold up my goings in thy paths, that my footsteps slip not" becomes in RV "My steps have held fast to thy paths, my feet have not slipped"; Prov 5 21, "He pondereth all his goings," is in RV "He maketh level all his paths," m "weigheth carefully"; conversely, in Ps 37 23, RV has "goings" for "steps"; in Jas 1 11 "goings" for "ways." In the important prophetic passage, Mic 5 2, it is said of the Ruler from Bethlehem, "whose goings forth have been from of old, from everlasting," RV "are from of old, from everlasting," m "from ancient days." Of God it is said in Hab 3 6 "His ways are everlasting," RV "His goings were as of old," m "His ways are everlasting."

GOLAN, gō′lan (גּוֹלָן, gōlān), GAULONITIS (Γαυλανῖτις, Gaulanítis): Golan was a city in the territory allotted to Manasseh in Bashan, the most northerly of the three cities of refuge E. of the Jordan (Dt 4 43; Josh 20 8); assigned with its "suburbs" to the Gershonite Levites (Josh 21 27; 1 Ch 6 71). It must have been a great and important city in its day; but the site cannot now be determined with any certainty. It was known to Jos (Ant, XIII, xv, 3). Near Golan Alexander was ambushed by Obodas, king of the Arabians; and his army, crowded together in a narrow and deep valley, was broken in pieces by the multitude of camels (BJ, I, iv, 4). This incident is located at Gadara in Ant, XIII, xiii, 5. Later, Golan was destroyed by Alexander. It had already given its name to a large district, Gaulonitis (BJ, III, iii, 1, 5; IV, i, 1). It formed the eastern boundary of Galilee. It was part of the tetrarchy of Philip (Ant, XVII, viii, 1; XVIII, iv, 6). The city was known to Eusebius as "a large village," giving its name to the surrounding country (Onom, s.v. Γαυλών, Gaulôn). This country must have corresponded roughly with the modern Jaulān, in which the ancient name is preserved. The boundaries of the province today are Mt. Hermon on the N., Jordan and the Sea of Galilee on the W., Wādy Yarmūk on the S., and Nahr 'Allān on the E. This plateau, which in the N. is about 3,000 ft. high, slopes gradually southward to a height of about 1,000 ft. It is entirely volcanic, and there are many cone-like peaks of extinct volcanoes, esp. toward the N. It affords good pasturage, and has long been a favorite summer grazing-ground of the nomads. Traces of ancient forests remain, but for the most part today it is treeless. To the E. of the Sea of Galilee the soil is deep and rich. Splendid crops of wheat are grown here, and olives flourish in the hollows. The country is furrowed by deep valleys that carry the water southwestward into the Sea of Galilee. This region has not yet been subjected to thorough examination, but many important ruins have been found, which tell of a plentiful and prosperous population in times long past. The best description of these, and of the region generally, will be found in Schumacher's The Jaulān, and Across the Jordan. To him also we owe the excellent maps which carry us eastward to the province of el-Ḥaurān.

Schumacher inclines to the belief that the ancient Golan may be represented by Sahm el-Jaulān, a large village fully 4 miles E. of Nahr 'Allān, and 4 miles S.E. of Tsīl. The extensive ruins probably date from early in the Christian era. The buildings are of stone, many of them of spacious dimensions, while the streets are wide and straight. The inhabitants number not more than 280. The surrounding soil is rich and well watered, bearing excellent crops. The present writer, after personal examination, corroborates Dr. Schumacher's description. Standing in the open country, it would be seen from afar; and it was easily accessible from all directions.

GOLD, gōld (זָהָב, zāhābh; χρυσός, chrusós): No metal has been more frequently mentioned in OT writings than gold, and none has had more terms applied to it. Among these terms the one most used is zāhābh. The Arab. equivalent, dhahab, is still the common name for gold throughout Pal, Syria and Egypt. With zāhābh frequently occur other words which, tr^d, mean "pure" (Ex 25 11), "refined" (1 Ch 28 18), "finest" (1 K 10 18), "beaten" (1 K 10 17), "Ophir" (Ps 45 9).

1. Terms

Other terms occurring are: פָּז, pāz, "fine gold" (Job 28 17; Ps 19 10; 21 3; 119 127; Prov 8 19; Cant 5 11.15; Isa 13 12; Lam 4 2); חָרוּץ, ḥārūç (Ps 68 13; Prov 3 14; 8 10.19; 16 16; Zec 9 3); כֶּתֶם, kethem, lit. "carved out" (Job 28 16.19; 31 24; Prov 25 12; Lam 4 1; Dnl 10 5); סְגוֹר, ṣeghōr (1 K 6 20; 7 50; Job 23 15); בֶּצֶר, beçer (in AV only: Job 22 24; RV "treasure").

2. Sources

Sources definitely mentioned in the OT are: Havilah (Gen 2 11.12); Ophir (1 K 9 28; 10 11; 22 48; 1 Ch 29 4; 2 Ch 8 18; 9 10; Job 22 24; 28 16; Ps 45 9; Isa 13 12); Sheba (1 K 10 2.10; 2 Ch 9 1.9; Ps 72 15; Isa 60 6; Ezk 27 22; 38 13); Arabia (2 Ch 9 14). We are not justified in locating any of these places too definitely. They probably all refer to some region of Arabia.

The late origin of the geological formation of Pal and Syria precludes the possibility of gold being found in any quantities (see Metals), so that the large quantities of gold used by the children of Israel in constructing their holy places was not the product of mines in the country, but was from the spoil taken from the inhabitants of the land (Nu 31 52), or brought with them from Egypt (Ex 3 22). This gold was probably mined in Egypt or India (possibly Arabia), and brought by the great caravan routes through Arabia to Syria, or by sea in the ships of Tyre (1 K 10 11.22; Ezk 27 21.22). There is no doubt about the Egyp sources. The old workings in the gold-bearing veins of the Egyp desert and the ruins of the buildings connected with the mining and refining of the precious metal still remain. This region is being reopened with the prospect of its becoming a source of part of the world's supply. It might be inferred from the extensive spoils in gold taken from the Midianites (£100,000 HDB, s.v.) that their country (Northwestern Arabia) produced gold. It is more likely that the Midianites had, in turn, captured most of it from other weaker nations. The tradition that Northwestern Arabia is rich in gold still persists. Every year Moslem pilgrims, returning from Mecca by the Damascus route, bring with them specimens of what is supposed to be gold ore. They secure it from the Arabs at the stopping-places along the route. Samples analyzed by the writer have been iron pyrites only. No gold-bearing rock has yet appeared. Whether these specimens come from the mines mentioned by Burton (The Land of Midian Revisited) is a question.

3. Forms

Gold formed a part of every household treasure (Gen 13 2; 24 35; Dt 8 13; 17 17; Josh 22 8; Ezk 28 4). It was probably treasured (a) in the form of nuggets (Job 28 6 RVm), (b) in regularly or irregularly shaped slabs or bars (Nu 7 14.20.84.86; Josh 7 21.24; 2 K 5 5), and (c) in the form of dust (Job 28 6). A specimen of yellow dust, which the owner claimed to have taken from an ancient jar, unearthed in the vicinity of the Hauran, was once brought to the writer's laboratory. On examination it was found to contain iron pyrites and metallic gold in finely divided state. It was probably part of an ancient household treasure. A common practice was to make gold into jewelry with the dual purpose of ornamentation and of treasuring it. This custom still prevails, esp. among the Moslems, who do not let out their money at interest. A poor woman will save her small coins until she has enough to buy a gold bracelet. This she will wear or put away against the day of need (cf Gen 24 22.53). It was weight and not beauty which was noted in the jewels (Ex 3 22; 11 2; 12 35). Gold coinage was unknown in the early OT times.

4. Uses

(1) The use of gold as the most convenient way of treasuring wealth is mentioned above. (2) Jewelry took many forms: armlets (Nu 31 50), bracelets (Gen 24 22), chains (Gen 41 42), crescents (Jgs 8 26), crowns (2 S 12 30; 1 Ch 20 2), earrings (Ex 32 2.3; Nu 31 50; Jgs 8 24.26), rings (Gen 24 22; 41 42; Jas 2 2). (3) Making and decorating objects in connection with places of worship: In the description of the building of the ark and the tabernacle in Ex 25 ff, we read of the lavish use of gold in overlaying wood and metals, and in shaping candlesticks, dishes, spoons, flagons, bowls, snuffers, curtain clasps, hooks, etc (one estimate of the value of gold used is £90,000; see HDB). In 1 K 6 ff; 1 Ch 28 f; 2 Ch 1 ff are records of still more extensive use of gold in building the temple. (4) Idols were made of gold (Ex 20 23; 32 4; Dt 7 25; 29 17; 1 K 12 28; Ps 115 4; 135 15; Isa 30 22; Rev 9 20). (5) Gold was used for lavish display. Among the fabulous luxuries of Solomon's court were his gold drinking-vessels (1 K 10 21), a throne of ivory overlaid with gold (1 K 10 18), and golden chariot trimmings (1 Ch 28 18). Sacred treasure saved from votive offerings or portions dedicated from booty were principally gold (Ex 25 36; Nu 7 14.20.84.86; 31 50.52.54; Josh 6 19.24; 1 S 6 8.11.15; 2 S 8 11; 1 Ch 18 7.10.11; 22 14.16; Mt 23 17). This treasure was the spoil most sought after by the enemy. It was paid to them as tribute (1 K 15 15; 2 K 12 18; 14 14; 16 8; 18 14–16; 23 33.35), or taken as plunder (2 K 24 13; 25 15).

5. Figurative

Gold is used to symbolize earthly riches (Job 3 15; 22 24; Isa 2 7; Mt 10 9; Acts 3 6; 20 33; Rev 18 12). Finer than gold, which, physically speaking, is considered nonperishable, typifies incorruptibility (Acts 17 29; 1 Pet 1 7.18; 3 3; Jas 5 3). Refining of gold is a figure for great purity or a test of stedfastness (Job 23 10; Prov 17 3; Isa 1 25; Mal 3 2; 1 Pet 1 7; Rev 3 18). Gold was the most valuable of metals. It stood for anything of great value (Prov 3 14; 8 10.19; 16 16.22; 25 12), hence was most worthy for use in worshipping Jeh (Ex 25 ff; Rev 1 12.13.20, etc), and the adornment of angels (Rev 15 6) or saints (Ps 45 13). The head was called golden as being the most precious part of the body (Cant 5 11; Dnl 2 38; cf "the golden bowl," Eccl 12 6). "The golden city" meant Babylon (Isa 14 4), as did also "the golden cup," sensuality (Jer 51 7). A crown of gold was synonymous with royal honor (Est 2 17; 6 8; Job 19 9; Rev 4 4; 14 14). Wearing of gold typified lavish adornment and worldly luxury (Jer 4 30; 10 4; 1 Tim 2 9; 1 Pet 3 3; Rev 17 4). Comparing men to gold suggested their nobility (Lam 4 1.2; 2 Tim 2 20).

GOLDEN, gōld″n, CALF: Probably a representation of the sun in Taurus. See Astrology, 7; Calf, Golden.

GOLDEN, gōld″n, CITY: The tr "golden city" (Isa 14 4) is an attempt to render the received text (מַדְהֵבָה, madhhēbhāh), but can hardly be justified. Almost all the ancient VSS read מַרְהֵבָה (marhēbhāh), a word which connotes unrest and insolence, fitting the context well.

GOLDEN NUMBER, gōld″n num′bẽr: Used in the regulation of the ecclesiastical calendar, in the "Metonic cycle" of 19 years, which almost exactly reconciles the natural month and the solar year. See Astronomy, I, 5.

GOLDSMITH, gōld′smith (צוֹרֵף, çōrēph): Goldsmiths are first mentioned in connection with the building of the tabernacle (Ex 31 4; 36 1). Later, goldsmiths' guilds are mentioned (Neh 3 8.32). The art of refining gold and shaping it into objects was probably introduced into Pal from Phoenicia (see Crafts). Examples of gold work from the earliest Egyp periods are so numerous in the museums of the world that we do not have to draw on our imaginations to appreciate the wonderful skill of the ancient goldsmiths. Probably their designs and methods were those later used by the Jews. The goldsmiths' art was divided into (1) the refining of the impure gold (Job 28 1; Prov 17 3; 25 4; 27 21; Isa 1 25; Mal 3 3); (2) shaping of objects, (a) casting idols (Nu 33 52; Hos 13 2), (b) making graven images (2 Ch 34 3.4; Jer 10 14; Nah 1 14), (c) the making of beaten or turned work (Ex 25 18), (d) plating or overlaying (Ex 25 11; 1 K 6 20), (e) soldering (Isa 41 7), (f) making of wire (Ex 28 6; 39 3). Most of these processes are carried on in Bible lands today. In Damascus there is a goldsmiths' quarter where the refining, casting and beating of gold are still carried on, probably in much the same way as in Solomon's time. Jews are found among the goldsmiths. In Beirût, it is a Jew who is esp. skilled in making refiners' pots. Daily, one can see the gold being refined, cast into lumps, beaten on an anvil, rolled between rollers into thin sheets, cut into narrow strips (wire), and wound on bobbins ready for the weaver. There are houses in Damascus and Aleppo still possessing beautiful gold overlaid work on wooden walls and ceilings, the work of goldsmiths of several centuries ago. James A. Patch

GOLGOTHA, gol′gō-tha (Γολγοθᾶ, Golgothá, from Aram. גָּלְגַּלְתָּא, gulgaltā', "a skull"): In three references (Mt 27 33; Mk 15 22; Jn 19 17) it is interpreted to mean κρανίου τόπος, kraníou tópos, "the place of a skull." In Lk 23 33 AV it is called "Calvary," but in RV simply "The skull." From the NT we may gather that it was outside the city (He 13 12), but close to it (Jn 19 20), apparently near some public thoroughfare (Mt 27 39), coming from the country (Mk 15 21). It was a spot visible, from some points, from afar (Mk 15 40; Lk 23 49).

1. The Name

Four reasons have been suggested for the name Golgotha or "skull": (1) That it was a spot where skulls were to be found lying about and probably, therefore, a public place of execution. This tradition apparently originates with Jerome (346–420 AD), who refers to (3), to condemn it, and says that "outside the city and without the gate there are places wherein the heads of condemned criminals are cut off and which have obtained the name of Calvary—that is, of the beheaded." This view has been adopted by several later writers. Against it may be urged that there is no shadow of evidence that there was any special place for Jewish executions in the 1st cent., and that, if there were, the corpses could have been allowed burial (Mt 27 58; Jn 19 38), in conformity with Jewish law (Dt 21 23) and with normal custom (Jos, BJ, IV, v, 2). (2) That the name was due to the skull-like shape of the hill—a modern popular view. No early Lat or Gr writer suggests such an idea, and there is no evidence from the Gospels that the Crucifixion occurred on a raised place at all. Indeed Epiphanius (4th cent.) expressly says: "There is nothing to be seen on the place resembling this name; for it is not situated upon a height that it should be called [the place] of a skull, answering to the place of the head in the human body." It is true that the tradition embodied in the name Mons Calvary appears as early as the 4th cent., and is materialized in the traditional site of the Crucifixion in the church of the Holy Sepulcher, but that the hill was skull-like in form is quite a modern idea. Guthe combines (2) and (3) and considers that a natural skull-like elevation came to be considered, by some folklore ideas, to be the skull of the first man. One of the strangest ideas is that of the late General Gordon, who thought that the resemblance to a skull lay in the contours of the ground as laid down in the ordinance survey map of Jerus. (3) That the name is due to an ancient pre-Christian tradition that the skull of Adam was found there. The first mention of this is by Origen (185–253 AD), who himself lived in Jerus 20 years. He writes: "I have received a tradition to the effect that the body of Adam, the first man, was buried upon the spot where Christ was crucified," etc. This tradition was afterward referred to by Athanasius, Epiphanius, Basil of Caesarea, Chrysostom and other later writers. The tomb and skull of Adam, still pointed out in an excavated chamber below the traditional Calvary, marks the survival of this tradition on the spot. This is by far the most ancient explanation of the name Golgotha and, in spite of the absurdity of the original tradition about Adam, is probably the true one.

(4) The highly improbable theory that the Capitolium of Ælia Capitolina (the name given by Hadrian to his new Jerus) stood where the Church of the Holy Sepulcher now is, and gave rise to the name Golgotha, is one which involves the idea that the site first received the name Golgotha in the 2d cent., and that all the references in the Gospels were inserted then. This is only mentioned to be dismissed as incompatible with history and common sense.

2. The Site

With regard to the position of the site of the Crucifixion (with which is bound up the site of the Tomb) the NT gives us no indication whatever; indeed, by those who abandon tradition, sites have been suggested on all sides of the city—N., S., E., and W. Two views hold the field today: (1) that the site of the Crucifixion, or at any rate that of the Tomb itself, is included within the precincts of the Church of the Holy Sepulcher; and (2) that a prominent, rounded, grassy hill above the so-called "Grotto of Jeremiah," N.E. of the Modern Damascus Gate, has at least a very high probability of being the true site. It is impossible here to go into the whole question, which requires minute and long elaboration, but excellent review of the whole evidence may be consulted in "Golgotha and the Holy Sepulcher," by the late Sir Charles W. Wilson, of PEF. Here only a few points can be touched upon. (1) For the traditional view it may be said that it seems highly improbable that so sacred a spot as this, particularly the empty tomb, could have been entirely forgotten. Although it is true that Jews and Heb Christians were driven out of Jerus after the second great revolt (130–33 AD), yet gentile Christians were free to return, and there was no break long enough to account for a site like this being entirely lost. Indeed there are traditions that this site was deliberately defiled by pagan buildings to annoy the Christians. Eusebius, at the time of Constantine, writes as if it were well known that a Temple of Aphrodite lay over the tomb.

Grotto of Jeremiah—"Gordon's Calvary."

He gives an account of the discovery of the spots still venerated as the Golgotha and the Tomb, and of the erection of churches in connection with them (Life of Constantine, III, 25–40). From the time of Constantine there has been no break in the reverence paid to these places. Of the earlier evidence Sir C. Wilson admits (loc. cit.) that "the tradition is so precarious and the evidence is undoubtedly so unsatisfactory as to raise serious doubts."

The topographical difficulties are dealt with in the art. Jerusalem. It is difficult for the visitor to Jerus sufficiently to realize that the center of gravity of the city has much changed; once it was on the Hill Ophel, and the southern slopes, now bare, were in Christ's time crammed with houses; in later times, from the 4th cent., it was the Church of the Holy Sepulcher round which the city tended to center. There is no insurmountable difficulty in believing that the site of the Crucifixion may be where tradition points out. As Sir C. Wilson says at the end of his book, "No objection urged against the sites [i.e. Golgotha and the Tomb] is of such a convincing nature that it need disturb the minds of those who accept, in all good faith, the authenticity of the places which are hallowed by the prayers of countless pilgrims since the days of Constantine" (loc. cit.).

(2) The so-called "Skull Hill" or "Green Hill" appears to have appealed first to Otto Thenius (1842), but has received its greatest support through the advocacy of the late Col. Conder and of the late Dr. Selah Merrill, U.S.A. consul at Jerus. The arguments for this site are mainly: (a) its conspicuous and elevated position—a position which must impress every reverent pilgrim as strikingly suitable for an imaginary reconstruction of the scene. The very greenness of the hill—it is the first green spot in the neighborhood of the city—may influence the subconsciousness of those who have been brought up from childhood to think of the "green hill far away," as the popular hymn puts it. When, however, we consider the question historically, there is not the slightest reason to expect that the crucifixion of Jesus, one of many hundreds, should have been dramatically located in a setting so consonant with the importance with which the world has since learned to regard the event. There is no evidence whatever that the crucifixion was on a hill, much less on such a conspicuous place. (b) The supposed resemblance to a human skull strikes many people, but it may be stated without hesitation that the most arresting points of the resemblance, the "eyeholes" and the rounded top, are not ancient; the former are due to artificial excavations going back perhaps a couple of centuries. Probably the whole formation of the hill, the sharp scarp to the S. and the 10 or more feet of earth accumulated on the summit are both entirely new conditions since NT times. (c) The nearness of the city walls and the great N. road which make the site so appropriate today are quite different conditions from those in NT times. It is only if the present N. wall can be proved to be on the line of the second wall that the argument holds good. On this see Jerusalem. (d) An argument has been based upon a supposed tradition that this spot was the Jewish place of stoning. This so-called tradition is worthless, and not a trace of it can be found outside interested circles, and even if it were the "place of stoning," it would be no argument for its being "Golgotha." To the Oriental, with his great respect for traditional sites, the church of the Holy Sepulcher, covering at once the Tomb, the Calvary, and other sacred spots, will probably always appeal as the appropriate spot: to the western tourist who wishes to visualize in the environs of Jerus in an appropriate setting the great world's tragedy, such a site as this "Skull Hill" must always make the greater appeal to his imagination, and both may find religious satisfaction in their ideas; but cold reason, reviewing the pros and cons, is obliged to say "not proven" to both, with perhaps an admission of the stronger case for the traditional spot.

GOLIATH, gō̇-lī'ath (גָּלְיָת, golyāth; Γολιάθ, Goliáth):

(1) The giant of Gath, and champion of the Phili army (1 S 17 4–23; 21 9; 22 10; 2 S 21 19; 1 Ch 20 5 ff). He defied the armies of Israel, challenging anyone to meet him in single combat while the two armies faced each other at Ephes-dammim. He was slain by the youthful David. Goliath was almost certainly not of Phili blood, but belonged to one of the races of giants, or aboriginal tribes, such as the Anakim, Avvim, Rephaim, etc. The Avvim had lived at Philistia, and most probably the giant was of that race. His size was most extraordinary. If a cubit was about 21 in., he was over 11 ft. in height; if about 18 in., he was over 9 ft. in height. The enormous weight of his armor would seem to require the larger cubit. This height probably included his full length in armor, helmet and all. In either case he is the largest man known to history. His sword was wielded by David to slay him and afterward carried about in his wanderings, so it could not have been excessively heavy. The story of his encounter with David is graphic, and the boasts of the two champions were perfectly in keeping with single combats in the Orient.

(2) The Goliath of 2 S 21 19 is another person, and quite probably a son of the first Goliath. He was slain by Elhanan, one of David's mighty men. The person mentioned in 1 Ch 20 5 is called Laḥmi, but this is almost certainly due to a corruption of the text. "The brother of Goliath" is the younger Goliath and probably a son of the greater Goliath, who had four sons, giants, one of them having 24 fingers and toes. See Elhanan; Lahmi.

GOMER, gō'mẽr (גֹּמֶר, gōmer): Given in Gen 10 2 f; 1 Ch 1 5 f as a son of Japheth. The name evidently designates the people called Gimirrâ by the Assyrians, Kimmerians by the Greeks. They were a barbaric horde of Aryans who in the 7th cent. BC left their abode in what is now Southern Russia and poured through the Caucasus into Western Asia, causing serious trouble to the Assyrians and other nations. One division moved eastward toward Media, another westward, where they conquered Cappadocia and made it their special abode. They fought also in other parts of Asia Minor, conquering some portions. The Armenian name for Cappadocia, Gamir, has come from this people. In Ezk 38 6 Gomer is mentioned as one of the northern nations.

GOMER, gō'mẽr (גֹּמֶר, gōmer; Γαμέρ, Gamér): Wife of Hosea. Hosea married Gomer according to Divine appointment, and this was the beginning of God's word to him (Hos 1 3; 3 1–4). She was to be a wife of whoredom and they were to have children of whoredom. This need not mean that at the time of marriage she was thus depraved, but she had the evil taint in her blood, had inherited immoral instincts. These soon manifested themselves, and the unfaithful, depraved wife of the prophet went deeper into sin. She seems to have left him and become the slave of her paramour (3 1). Hosea is now commanded by Jeh to buy her back, paying the price of the ordinary slave. The prophet keeps her in confinement and without a husband for some time. This experience of the prophet was typical of Israel's unfaithfulness, of Israel's exile, and of God bringing her back after the punishment of the exile. See Hosea. J. J. Reeve

GOMORRAH, gō̇-mor′a (עֲמֹרָה, 'ămōrāh; LXX and NT Γομόρρα, Gomórra, or Γόμορρα, Gómorra; Arab. Ghamara, "to overwhelm with water"): One of the Cities of the Plain (q.v.) destroyed by fire from heaven in the time of Abraham and Lot (Gen 19 23–29). It was located probably in the plain S. of the Dead Sea, now covered with water. See Arabah; Cities of the Plain; Dead Sea. De Saulcy, however, with others who place the Cities of the Plain at the N. end of the Dead Sea, fixes upon Khumran (or Gumran), marked on the Survey Map of Pal N. of Ras Feshkeh, where there are ruins about a mile from the Dead Sea. But there is nothing to support this view except the faint resemblance of the name and the inconclusive arguments placing the Cities of the Plain at that end of the sea. George Frederick Wright

GOOD, go͝od (טוֹב, ṭōbh, טוּב, ṭūbh, יָטַב, yāṭabh; ἀγαθός, agathós, ἀγαθόν, agathón, καλός, kalós, καλόν, kalón): In Eng. "good" is used in various senses, most of which are represented in the Bible.

(1) In the OT the commonest word is ṭōbh, occurring very frequently and tr^d in a great variety of ways. Of the different shades of meaning, which frequently run into each other, the following may be distinguished: (a) Possessing desirable qualities, beneficial, agreeable, e.g. "good for food" (Gen 2 9); "We will do thee good" (Nu 10 29); "Who will show us any good?" (Ps 4 6); "good tidings of good" (Isa 52 7). (b) Moral excellence, piety: "to know good and evil" (Gen 3 22); "that which is right and good" (Dt 6 18*a;* 1 S 12 23); "good and bad" (1 K 3 9, RV "evil"); "Depart from evil and do good" (Ps 37 27); "a good man" (Prov 12 2); cf Isa 5 20; Mic 6 8, etc. (c) Kind, benevolent: "The men were very good unto us" (1 S 25 15); "Give thanks unto Jeh; for he is good" (1 Ch 16 34); "the good Jeh" (2 Ch 30 18); "God is good to Israel" (Ps 73 1); "Jeh is good to all" (Ps 145 9), etc. (d) Serviceable, adequate, sufficient: "saw the light that it was good" (Gen 1 4; so vs 10.12, etc); "not good that the man should be alone" (2 18); in the frequent phrase, "if it seem good" (1 Ch 13 2; Est 5 4, etc), sometimes rendered, "if it please" (Neh 2 5.7; Est 1 19, etc). (e) Not small or deficient (full, complete): "a good old age" (Gen 15 15; 25 8); "a good dowry" (30 20); "good ears," "years," "kine" (41 24.26.35); "good understanding" (1 S 25 3); "good trees"—"land" (2 K 3 19.25), etc. (f) Not blemished, fair, honorable: "tender and good" (Gen 18 7); "good kids" (27 9); "good report" (1 S 2 24; cf 2 K 20 3; Jer 24 2); and the renderings "fair" (Gen 26 7, etc), "beautiful" (2 S 11 2), "pleasant" (2 K 2 19), etc. (g) Pleasure-giving, happy: "glad of heart" (1 K 8 66; Est 5 9); sometimes in AV and RV tr^d "merry" (Jgs 16 25; 1 S 25 36; 2 S 13 28; Prov 15 15, RV "cheerful"), etc.

Changes that may be noted in RV are such as, "good" for "ready" (Isa 41 7); "I have no good beyond thee" for "My goodness extendeth not to thee" (Ps 16 2); "goodly" for "good" (45 1); "good" for "goodness" (107 9); "good" for "well" (Zec 8 15).

Ṭūbh means something good, e.g. "the good of the land" (Gen 45 18.20; Dt 6 11; Job 21 16, RV "prosperity").

Yāṭabh, "to do good," occurs several times, as, "I will surely do thee good" (Gen 32 12); "to do good" (Lev 5 4); "Make your ways and your doings good," RV "amend" (Jer 18 11; Zeph 1 12, etc).

Numerous other Heb words are rendered "good" in various verbal connections and otherwise, as "to bring good tidings" (2 S 4 10; Isa 40 9, etc); "take good heed" (Dt 2 4; 4 15; Josh 23 11); "make good" (Ex 21 34), etc; "good will" (raçōn, Dt 33 16; Mal 2 13); "what good?" RV "what advantages?" (kishrōn, Eccl 5 11); "good for nothing," RV "profitable" (çālē^{a}ḥ, Jer 13 10), etc. In Jer 18 4, "as seemed good to the potter," the word is yāshār, which means lit. "right."

(2) In the NT the words most frequently tr^d "good" are agathos and kalos. The former, agathos, denotes good as a quality, physical or moral. Thus, "He maketh his sun to rise on the evil and the good" (Mt 5 45); "good gifts" (7 11); "Good Master [RV "Teacher"] . . . . Why callest thou me good? none is good save one" (Mk 10 17 f; Lk 18 18 f; cf Mt 19 16 f); "they that have done good" (Jn 5 29). Sometimes it is equivalent to "kind" (thus Tit 2 5 RV); to agathon is "that which is good" (Lk 6 45; Rom 7 13; 1 Thess 5 15; 1 Pet 3 13), etc; "that which is honest," RV "honorable" (2 Cor 13 7); "meet" (Mt 15 26; Mk 7 27); "worthy," RV "honorable" (Jas 2 7); agathon is "a good thing," as "good things to them that ask him" (Mt 7 11); "Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?" (Jn 1 46), etc; agathoergéō (1 Tim 6 18), and agathopoiéō (Mk 3 4; Acts 14 17), etc, "to do good."

Kalos is properly, "beautiful," "pleasing," "useful," "noble," "worthy" in a moral sense, e.g. "that they may see your good works" (Mt 5 16); "She hath wrought a good work on me" (Mt 26 10; Mk 14 6); "the good shepherd" (Jn 10 11.14); "Many good works have I showed you" (10 32); "good and acceptable before God" (1 Tim 5 4; RV omits "good"); "the good fight" (2 Tim 4 7); "good works" (Tit 2 7); "the good word of God" (He 6 5). But it is often practically equivalent to agathos, e.g. "good fruit" (Mt 3 10); "good ground" (13 23); "good seed" (13 24); but the idea of useful may underlie such expressions; to kalon is properly "that which is beautiful." It occurs in Rom 7 18.21; 1 Thess 5 21, "Hold fast that which is good." In Rom 7 it seems to be used interchangeably with to agathon. In Rom 5 7, "the good man" (ho agathos) is distinguished from "a righteous man" (díkaios): "For the good man some one would even dare to die" (cf Rom 7 16; He 5 14; Jas 4 17); kalṓs, "well," "pleasantly," is tr^d "good" (Lk 6 27; Jas 2 3); kalodidáskalos (Tit 2 3), "teachers of good things," RV "of that which is good."

"Good" occurs in the rendering of many other Gr words and phrases, as eudokía, "good pleasure" (Eph 1 9); "good will" (Lk 2 14; Phil 1 15); sumphérō, "to bear together," "not good to marry" (Mt 19 10), RV "expedient"; philágathos, "a lover of good" (Tit 1 8); chrēstología, "good words" (Rom 16 18, RV "smooth speech," etc).

The following changes in RV may be noted. In Lk 2 14 for "men of good will" (eudokia) RV reads "in whom he is well pleased," m "good pleasure among men, Gr men of good pleasure." The meaning is "men to whom God is drawing nigh in good-will or acceptance"; cf Lk 4 19, "the acceptable year of the Lord"; 4 43, "Preach the good tidings of the kingdom of God." In Mt 11 5; Lk 4 43; 7 22; 1 Pet 1 25 and (ARV) Rev 14 6 "the gospel" is changed into "good tidings." In Mt 18 8 f; Mk 9 43.45.47; Lk 5 39, "good" is substituted for "better"; on the last passage in notes "Many authorities read 'better'"; in 1 Cor 9 15, "good . . . . rather" for "better"; "good" is substituted in Lk 1 19; 8 1 and Acts 13 32 for "glad"; in Acts 6 3 for "honest"; in He 13 9 for "a good thing." In 2 Thess 1 11, "all the good pleasure of his goodness" becomes "every desire of goodness" (m "Gr good pleasure of goodness"); in 1 Tim 3 2, "good" (kósmios) becomes "orderly." There are many other instances of like changes. See GOODNESS; GOOD, CHIEF.

GOOD, CHIEF: What this consisted in was greatly discussed in ancient philosophy. Varro enumerated 288 answers to the question. By Plato "the good" was identified with God.

In the OT while the "good" of the nation consisted in earthly well-being or prosperity (Dt 28 etc), that of the individual was to be found only in God Himself (Ps 16 2 RV, "I have no good beyond thee"; 42 1–5; 43 5; 73 25–28; Jer 31 33 f; Hab 3 17–19). This implied godly conduct (Mic 6 8, etc), and led to the experience described as "blessedness" (Ps 1, etc; Jer 17 7, etc). It is the "Wisdom" extolled in Prov 1 20; 8 1 f (cf Ecclus 1 1 f; 5 1 f), elsewhere described as "the fear of Jeh." That God alone can be the true "good" of man is implied in the fact that man was created in the image of God (Gen 1 27).

In the NT the true "good" is placed by Jesus in "the kingdom of God" (Mt 6 33; 13 44 f, etc). This means nothing earthly merely (Mt 6 19), but heavenly and eternal. It implies the OT conception that God is the true "good"; for to seek the Kingdom supremely means whole-hearted devotion to God as our heavenly Father and to His righteousness. It was also spoken of by Jesus, as sonship to the heavenly Father (Mt 5 45, etc). This "good" is not something merely to be given to men, but must be sought after and won through taking up a right attitude toward God and our fellows, cherishing the Love that God is, and acting it out in kindness and righteousness, in resemblance to our God and Father (Mt 5 43–48; here Gen 1 27 is implied).

In some of the epistles Christ is represented as the true "good" (Phil 3 8 f; Col 3 1–4.11). This is because in Him God was manifested in His Truth and Grace; in Him "the Kingdom" was present; through His cross the world is so reconciled to God that men can find acceptance and rest in Him as their "good"; Christ Himself in the Spirit is our Life; in Him we have "God with us." Having God as our "good," nothing but good, in the truest and highest sense, can come to us. Even the most seemingly adverse things are turned into good "to them that love God" (Rom 8 28).

Our true "good" is found thus in God even in this present life; but its fulness can be realized only in the eternal life beyond. Placing our "good" in God leads to such life in devotion to the "good" that God is, as tends to bring all that is best to this present world. It is men's failure to do this that is the source of our misery (Jer 2 13, etc). The ultimate ideal is that God shall be "all in all" (1 Cor 15 28).

GOODLINESS, gŏŏd′li-nes: This word is found in Isa 40 6 as the tr of חֶסֶד, ḥeṣedh, commonly tr^d "mercy," "kindness," etc: "All flesh is grass, and all the goodliness [beauty, charm, comeliness] thereof is as the flower of the field." The rendering is retained by ERV and ARV as appropriate in this place; ḥeṣedh is frequently tr^d "goodness." In Isa 40 6 LXX has dóxa, "glory" (so also 1 Pet 1 24), which also fitly expresses the idea of the passage.

GOODLY, gŏŏd′li (טוֹב, ṭōbh; καλός, kalós, λαμπρός, lamprós): In the OT various words are tr^d "goodly," the most of them occurring only once; ṭōbh (the common word for "good") is several times tr^d "goodly," chiefly in the sense of form or appearance, e.g. "a goodly child" (Ex 2 2); "that goodly mountain" (Dt 3 25); yāpheh ("fair") is similarly tr^d in Gen 39 6, RV "comely," and mar'eh in 2 S 23 21. Other words, such as 'addīr imply excellence, honor, etc, e.g. Ezk 17 23, "bear fruit, and be a goodly cedar"; hōdh, "his goodly horse" (Zec 10 3); others imply beauty, ornament, such as p^e'ēr, "goodly bonnets," RV "headtires" (Ex 39 28); shāphar ("bright," "fair"), "a goodly heritage" (Ps 16 6); once 'Ēl ("God of might") is employed, RV "cedars of God," m "goodly cedars" (Ps 80 10); r^{e}nānīm ("joyous soundings or shoutings") is tr^d in Job 39 13, "goodly wings," probably from the sound made in flying or flapping; ERV has "The wing of the ostrich rejoiceth," ARV (wings) "wave proudly." For "goodly castles" (Nu 31 10) RV has "encampments"; "goodly vessels" (2 Ch 32 27) for "pleasant jewels"; "goodly" is substituted for "good" (Ps 45 1; Cant 1 3); "goodly things" for "all the goods" (Gen 24 10); "goodly frame," ARV for "comely proportion" (Job 41 12).

In the NT kalos ("beautiful") is tr^d "goodly" in Mt 13 45, "goodly pearls" and Lk 21 5 "goodly stones"; lampros ("bright") in Jas 2 2, "goodly apparel," RV "fine clothing," and Rev 18 14, "dainty and goodly," RV "dainty and sumptuous." In He 11 23, RV substitutes "goodly" for "proper."

"Goodly" occurs in Apoc, 1 Esd 4 18; Jth 8 7 (hōraíos); 2 Macc 9 16, "goodly gifts," kállistos, RV "goodliest."

W. L. WALKER

GOODLY TREES (פְּרִי עֵץ הָדָר, p^{e}rī 'ēç hādhār, "the fruit [AV "boughs"] of goodly [=beautiful or noble] trees"): One of the four species of plants used in the Feast of Tabernacles (Lev 23 40). In the Talm (Ṣukkāh 35a*) this is explained to be the citron (Citrus medica) known in Heb as 'ethrōgh. This tradition is ancient, at least as old as the Maccabees. Jos (Ant, XIII, xiii, 5) records that Alexander Jannaeus, while serving at the altar during this feast, was pelted by the infuriated Jews with citrons. This fruit also figures on coins of this period. It is probable that the citron tree (Malum Persica) was imported from Babylon by Jews returning from the captivity. A citron is now carried in the synagogue by every orthodox Jew in one hand, and the lūlābh (of myrtle, willow, and palm branch) in the other, on each day of the Feast of Tabernacles.

Originally the "goodly trees" had a much more generic sense, and the term is so interpreted by the LXX and Vulg. See FEASTS AND FASTS; BOOTH.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN

GOODMAN, go͝od′man (אִישׁ, 'īsh; οἰκοδεσπότης, oikodespótēs): The word occurs once in the OT and is a tr of the ordinary word for "man," 'īsh (Prov 7 19). "The goodman is not at home," so AV and RV, but ARV, more correctly, "The man is not at home"; i.e. the husband is not at home; the Geneva and Douay VSS have "My husband is not at home": so Wycliffe; while the Vulg has "There is not a man in her house." In the NT "goodman" is a tr of oikodespotēs. This word occurs 12 t in the Synoptists, and nowhere else. AV and RV have 3 translations of the word, ARV 2. In 4 places AV has "goodman" while ARV has "householder" or "master of the house" (Mt 20 11; 24 43; Lk 12 39; 22 11). In all the other places it is trd "householder" or "master of the house." RV retains "goodman" in Mk 14 14 and Lk 22 11. The word lit. means "master of the house," or "husband." The adj. is a mark of respect, and is used somewhat as our word "Mr.," an appellative of respect or civility. Relationship by marriage was distinguished by this epithet, as "good-father," "good-sister," both in England and Scotland. Later the adj. lost its distinguishing force and was swallowed up in the word.

J. J. REEVE

GOODNESS, go͝od′nes: This word in the OT is the tr of ṭōbh (Ex 18 9; Ps 16 2, RV "good"; 23 6), etc; of ṭūbh (Ex 33 19; Ps 31 19; Jer 31 14; Hos 3 5), etc; of ḥeṣedh (Ex 34 6), "abundant in g.," ERV "plenteous in mercy," ARV "abundant in loving kindness"; "The g. of God endureth continually," RV "mercy," ARV "loving kindness" (Ps 52 1), etc.

In the NT it is the tr of chrēstótēs ("usefulness," benignity); "the riches of his g." (Rom 2 4; 11 22, thrice); of chrēstós ("useful," "benign," "kind," as in Lk 6 35); "The g. of God leadeth thee to repentance" (Rom 2 4); of agathōsúnē (found only in the NT and LXX and writings based thereon), "full of g." (Rom 15 14); "gentleness, goodness, faith" (Gal 5 22); "in all g. and righteousness and truth" (Eph 5 9); "all the good pleasure of his g.," RV "every desire of g." (2 Thess 1 11).

The thought of God as good and the prominence given to "good" and "goodness" are distinctive features of the Bible. In the passage quoted above from Gal 5 22, "goodness" is one of the fruits of the indwelling Spirit of God, and in that from Eph 5 9 it is described as being, along with righteousness and truth, "the fruit of the light" which Christians had been "made" in Christ. Here, as elsewhere, we are reminded that the Christian life in its truth is likeness to God, the source and perfection of all good. 2 Thess 1 11 regards God Himself as expressing His goodness in and through us. See GOOD; GOOD, CHIEF.

GOODS, go͝odz (רְכוּשׁ, rᵉkhūsh, טוּב, ṭūbh; τὰ ὑπάρχοντα, tá hupárchonta): In the OT rᵉkhūsh ("substance") is most frequently trd "goods," as in Gen 14 11.12.16.21, etc; ṭūbh is also 3 t so trd in AV (Gen 24 10, RV "goodly things," m "all the goods"; Neh 9 25, RV "good things"; Job 20 21, RV "prosperity"). Other words are 'ōn (Job 20 10, RV "wealth"); ḥayīl ("force," Nu 31 9; Zeph 1 13, RV "wealth"); ṭōbh (Dt 28 11, RV "for good"; Eccl 5 11); mᵉlā'khāh ("work," Ex 22 8.11); nikhṣīn (Aram. "riches," Ezr 6 8; 7 26); ḳinyān, "getting" (Ezk 38 12 f). We have ta huparchonta (lit. "the things existing") in Mt 24 47, "ruler over all his goods," RV "all that he hath," etc. Agathós is trd "goods" in Lk 12 18 f; skeúos ("instrument") in Mt 12 29; Mk 3 27; tá sá ("the things belonging to thee") in Lk 6 30; ousía ("substance") in Lk 15 12, RV "substance"; húparxis ("existence," "substance") in Acts 2 45; ploutéō ("to be rich") in Rev 3 17, RV "have gotten riches." In RV "goods" stands instead of "carriage" (Jgs 18 21), of "stuff" (Lk 17 31), of "good" (1 Jn 3 17). "Goods" was used in the sense of "possessions" generally; frequently in this sense in Apoc (1 Esd 6 32); ta huparchonta (Tob 1 20); Ecclus 5 1, "Set not thy heart upon thy goods" (chrēma), etc.

GOPHER WOOD, gō′fẽr wo͝od (עֲצֵי גֹפֶר, 'ăçē ghōpher): The wood from which Noah's ark was made (Gen 6 14). Gopher is a word unknown elsewhere in Heb or allied languages. Lagarde considered that it was connected with גָּפְרִית, gophrīth, meaning "brimstone," or "pitch," while others connect it with כֹּפֶר, kōphēr, also meaning "pitch"; hence, along both lines, we reach the probability of some resinous wood, and pine, cedar, and cypress have all had their supporters. A more probable explanation is that which connects gōpher with the modern Arab. kufa, a name given to the boats made of interwoven willow branches and palm leaves with a coating of bitumen outside, used today on the rivers and canals of Mesopotamia. In the Gilgameš story of the flood it is specially mentioned that Noah daubed his ark both inside and out with a kind of bitumen. See DELUGE OF NOAH.

GORE, gōr (נָגַח, nāghaḥ): "Gore" occurs only three times in AV, viz. Ex 21 28.31 bis, "if an ox gore a man or a woman," etc; in vs 29.32.36, AV has "push" (with his horn), RV "gore." The same vb. in Piel and Hithpael is elsewhere trd "push" and "pushing" (Dt 33 17, "He shall push the peoples," RVm "gore"; 1 K 22 11; Ps 44 5; Ezk 34 21; Dnl 8 4; 11 40, RV "contend," m "Heb push at," as an ox pushes with his horns so should the king fight—a fitting description of warfare).

GORGEOUS, gôr′jus, GORGEOUSLY, gôr′jus-li (מִכְלוֹל, mikhlōl; λαμπρός, lamprós): Mikhlōl occurs twice in the OT, trd in AV and RV "most gorgeously" (Ezk 23 12); in Ezk 38 4, AV translates "all sorts" (of armor), RV "clothed in full armor." Lampros ("shining," "bright"), is only once trd "gorgeous" (Lk 23 11); "Herod . . . . arrayed him in a gorgeous robe," RV "gorgeous apparel." We have also in Lk 7 25, "They that are gorgeously apparelled [éndoxos, "splendid," "glorious"] . . . . are in kings' courts." They were scarcely to be looked for among the prophets, or in the new community of Jesus.

GORGET, gôr′jet: Appears only once in AV (1 S 17 6), being placed in the margin as an alternative to "target [of brass]" in the description of the armor worn by Goliath of Gath. The Heb word thus trd (כִּידוֹן, kīdhōn) really means a "javelin," and is so rendered in RV and ARV here and in 1 S 17 45 ("Thou comest to me with a sword, and with a spear, and with a javelin"). See ARMOR, I, 4, (3). Gorget, though so rarely used in Scripture and now displaced in our revised versions, occurs not infrequently and in various senses in Eng. lit. In the meaning of "a piece of armor for the gorge or throat" which seems to have been in the mind of King James's translators, it is found in early Eng.

writers and down to recent times. Spenser has it in Faerie Queene, IV, iii, 12:

> "His weasand-pipe it through his gorget cleft";

Scott, Marmion, V, ii:

> "Their brigantines and gorgets light";

and Prescott, Ferdinand and Isabella, III, 47: "The gorget gave way and the sword entered his throat."

GORGIAS, gôr′ji-as (Γοργίας, Gorgías): A general in the service of Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Macc 3 38; 2 Macc 8 9). Lysias, who had been left as regent during the absence of Antiochus in Persia, appointed Gorgias to take the command against Judaea in 166 BC. In 1 Macc 4 1–24 is recorded a night attack by Gorgias with 5,000 foot and 1,000 horse upon the camp of Judas Maccabaeus in the neighborhood of Emmaus, in which Judas was completely victorious. The victory was all the more striking as the force of Judas was considerably smaller in number and had "not armor nor swords to their minds" (1 Macc 4 6). Later on (164 BC) he held a garrison in Jamnia, and gained a victory over the forces of Joseph and Azarias who, envying the glory of Judas and Jonathan, in direct disobedience to the orders of Judas, attacked Gorgias and were defeated.

Jamnia as given in Jos, Ant, XII, viii, 6, is probably the correct reading for Idumaea in 2 Macc 12 32. The doings of Gorgias in 2 Macc are recorded with some confusion. He was regarded with special hostility by the Jews. In 2 Macc 12 35 he is described as "the accursed man." J. Hutchison

GORTYNA, gor-tī′na (Γορτύναι, Gortúnai): A city in Crete, next in importance to Gnossus. It is mentioned in 1 Macc 15 23. See Crete.

1. Meaning of Name

GOSHEN, gō′shen (גֹּשֶׁן, gōshen; Γεσέμ, Gesém): The region where the Hebrews dwelt in Egypt. If the LXX reading Gesem be correct, the word, which in its Heb form has no known meaning, may mean "cultivated"—comparing the Arab. root jashima, "to labor." Egyptologists have suggested a connection with the Egyp word ḳās, meaning "inundated land" because Goshen was apparently the same region, called by the Greeks the "Arabian nome," which had its capital at Phakousa representing the Egyp Pa-ḳas (Brugsch, Geog., I, 298), the name of a town, with the determinative for "pouring forth." Van der Hardt, indeed, more than a century ago (see Sayce, Higher Criticism, 235), supposed the two words to be connected. Dr. Naville in 1887 found the word as denoting the vicinity of Pi-sopt (now Saft el Henneh), 6 miles E. of Zagazig—in the form Ḳ-s-m. He concludes that this was the site of Phakousa, but the latter is usually placed at Tell el Faḳûs, about 15 miles S. of Zoan (q.v.), and this appears to be the situation of the "City of Arabia" which St. Silvia, about 385 AD, identifies with Gesse or Goshen; for she reached it in her journey from Heroöpolis, through Goshen to Tathnis or Taphnis (Daphnai), and to Pelusium.

2. Situation

It is generally agreed that Goshen was the region E. of the Bubastic branch of the Nile; and in Ps 78 12.43, it seems to be clearly identified with the "field [or pastoral plain] of Zoan," which was probably also the "land of Rameses" mentioned (Gen 47 11) as possessed by Jacob's family (see Raamses; Zoan). Where first mentioned (Gen 45 10), Goshen is promised by Joseph to Jacob as a land fit for flocks, and the LXX here reads, "Gesem of Arabia," probably referring to the Arabian nome which took its name from the "desert" which defended the E. border of Egypt. In the second notice (Gen 46 28 f), the boundary of the land of Goshen, where Joseph met his father, is called in the LXX Hērōō(n)-polis, and also (ver 28) "the land of Ramesse(s)"; so that in the 3d cent. BC Goshen seems to have been identified with the whole region of the Arabian nome, as far S. as Heroöpolis which (see Pithom) lay in Wâdy Tumeilât. Goshen included pastoral lands (Gen 46 34; 47 1.4.6.27; 50 8) and was still inhabited by the Hebrews at the time of the Exodus (Ex 8 22; 9 26), after which it is unnoticed in the OT. The name, however, applied to other places which were probably "cultivated" lands, including a region in the S. of Pal (Josh 10 41; 11 16), "all the country of Goshen [LXX Gosóm], even unto Gibeon," and a city of Judah (Josh 15 51) in the mountains near Beersheba. These notices seem to show that the word is not of Egyp origin.

3. Description

The region thus very clearly indicated was not of any great extent, having an area of only about 900 sq. miles, including two very different districts. The western half, immediately E. of the Bubastic branch of the Nile, stretches from Zoan to Bubastis (at both of which cities records of the Hyksos ruler Apepi have been found), or a distance of about 35 miles N. and S. This region is an irrigated plain which is still considered to include some of the best land in Egypt. The description of the land of Rameses (see Raamses), in the 14th cent. BC, shows its fertility; and St. Silvia says that the land of Goshen was 16 miles from Heroöpolis, and that she traveled for two days in it "through vineyards, and balsam plantations, and orchards, and tilled fields, and gardens." The region narrows from about 15 miles near the seashore to about 10 miles between Zagazig and Tell el Kebîr on the S. E. of this, a sandy and gravelly desert lies between the Nile plain and the Suez Canal, broadening southward from near Daphnai (Tell Defeneh) to Wâdy Tumeilât, where it is 40 miles across E. and W. S. of this valley an equally waterless desert stretches to Suez, and from the Bitter Lakes on the E. to the vicinity of Heliopolis (S.E. of Cairo) on the W. Thus Wâdy Tumeilât, which is fertilized by the Nile waters (see Pi-Hahiroth), and contains villages and corn fields, is the only natural route for a people driving with their flocks and herds by which the vicinity of the Red Sea can be reached, the road leading from the S. end of the "field of Zoan" near Bubastis, and 40 miles eastward to the "edge of the wilderness" (see Etham) and the head of the Bitter Lakes. This physical conformation is important in relation to the route of the Israelites (see Exodus); and Wâdy Tumeilât may very possibly be intended to be included in Goshen, as the LXX translators supposed.

GOSHEN, gō'shen (גֹּשֶׁן, gōshen):

(1) Mentioned as a country (אֶרֶץ, 'ereç) in the S. of Judah distinct from the "hill country," the Negeb and the Shephelah (Josh 10 41; 11 16). Unidentified.

(2) A town in the S.W. part of the hill country of Judah (Josh 15 51), very probably connected in some way with the district (1).

(3) See preceding article.

GOSPEL, gos'pel (τὸ εὐαγγέλιον, tó euaggélion): The word "gospel" is derived from the AS word which meant "the story concerning God." In the NT the Gr word euaggelion, means "good news." It proclaims tidings of deliverance. The word sometimes stands for the record of the life of Our Lord (Mk 1 1), embracing all His teachings, as in Acts 20 24. But the word "gospel" now has a peculiar use, and describes primarily the message which Christianity announces. "Good news" is its significance. It means a gift from God. It is the proclamation of the forgiveness of sins and sonship with God restored through Christ. It means remission of sins and reconciliation with God. The gospel is not only a message of salvation, but also the instrument through which the Holy Spirit works (Rom 1 16).

The gospel differs from the law in being known entirely from revelation. It is proclaimed in all its fulness in the revelation given in the NT. It is also found, although obscurely, in the OT. It begins with the prophecy concerning the 'seed of the woman' (Gen 3 15), and the promise concerning Abraham, in whom all the nations should be blessed (Gen 12 3; 15 5) and is also indicated in Acts 10 43 and in the argument in Rom 4.

In the NT the gospel never means simply a book, but rather the message which Christ and His apostles announced. In some places it is called "the gospel of God," as, for example, Rom 1 1; 1 Thess 2 2.9; 1 Tim 1 11. In others it is called "the gospel of Christ" (Mk 1 1; Rom 1 16; 15 19; 1 Cor 9 12.18; Gal 1 7). In another it is called "the gospel of the grace of God" (Acts 20 24); in another "the gospel of peace" (Eph 6 15); in another "the gospel of your salvation" (Eph 1 13); and in yet another "the glorious gospel" (2 Cor 4 4 AV). The gospel is Christ: He is the subject of it, the object of it, and the life of it. It was preached by Him (Mt 4 23; 11 5; Mk 1 14; Lk 4 18 m), by the apostles (Acts 16 10; Rom 1 15; 2 16; 1 Cor 9 16) and by the evangelists (Acts 8 25).

We must note the clear antithesis between the law and the gospel. The distinction between the two is important because, as Luther indicates, it contains the substance of all Christian doctrine. "By the law," says he, "nothing else is meant than God's word and command, directing what to do and what to leave undone, and requiring of us obedience of works. But the gospel is such doctrine of the word of God that neither requires our works nor commands us to do anything, but announces the offered grace of the forgiveness of sin and eternal salvation. Here we do nothing, but only receive what is offered through the word." The gospel, then, is the message of God, the teaching of Christianity, the redemption in and by Jesus Christ, the only begotten Son of God, offered to all mankind. And as the gospel is bound up in the life of Christ, His biography and the record of His works, and the proclamation of what He has to offer, are all gathered into this single word, of which no better definition can be given than that of Melanchthon: "The gospel is the gratuitous promise of the remission of sins for Christ's sake." To hold tenaciously that in this gospel we have a supernatural revelation is in perfect consistency with the spirit of scientific inquiry. The gospel, as the whole message and doctrine of salvation, and as chiefly efficacious for contrition, faith, justification, renewal and sanctification, deals with facts of revelation and experience.

1. Scope of Article

I. Introductory.—The present art. is confined to the consideration of the relations and general features of the first 3 Gospels (Mt, Mk, Lk)—ordinarily named "the Synoptic Gospels," because, in contrast with the Fourth Gospel, they present, as embodying a common tradition, the same general view of the life and teaching of Jesus during His earthly ministry, and of His death and resurrection. The Fourth Gospel, in itself and in its relation to the Synoptics, with the Johannine literature and theology generally, are treated in special articles. See John, Gospel of; Johannine Theology, etc.

2. The Gospels in Church Tradition

The place of the Gospels in church tradition is secure. Eusebius places the 4 Gospels among the books that were never controverted in the church (HE, III, 25). It is acknowledged that by the end of the 2d cent. these 4 Gospels, and none else, ascribed to the authors whose names they bear, were in universal circulation and undisputed use throughout the church, stood at the head of church catalogues and of all VSS, were freely used, not only by the Fathers of the church (Irenaeus, Tertullian, Clement, Origen, etc), but by pagans and heretics, and by these also were ascribed to the disciples of Christ as their authors. Justin Martyr, in the middle of the century, freely quotes from "Memoirs of the Apostles," "which are called Gospels," "composed by the apostles and those that followed them" (1 Apol. 66–67; Dial. with Trypho, 10, 100, 103). What these Gospels were is made apparent by the Diatessaron, or Harmony of Four, of his disciple Tatian (c 170), constructed from the 4 Gospels we possess. The first to mention Mt and Mk by name is Papias of Hierapolis (c 120–30; in Euseb., HE, III, 39). Dr. Sanday is disposed to carry back the extracts from Papias to about 100 AD (Fourth Gospel, 151); Dr. Moffatt likewise says, "These explanations of Mt and Mk must have been in circulation by the end of the 1st cent." (Intro to Lit. of NT, 187). The gist of the testimony of Papias is: "Mark, having become the interpreter of Peter, wrote down accurately, though he did not record in order, that which was either said or done by Christ"; "Matthew composed the Oracles [Logia] in Heb [Aram.], and each one interpreted them as he was able." Eusebius evidently took what he quotes about Mt and Mk from Papias to refer to our present Gospels, but a problem arises as to the relation of the Aram. "Logia" said to be composed by Matthew to our canonical Gr Gospel, which was the only Gospel of Mt known to the early Fathers. There is no ground for the supposition that the Jewish-Christian GOSPEL ACC. TO THE HE (q.v.) was the original of the Greek Mt; it was on the other hand derived from it. The Gnostic Marcion used a mutilated Lk. Cf, further, below on dating, and for details see special arts. on the respective Gospels; also BIBLE; CANON OF THE NT.

1. Nature of Problem

II. The Synoptic Problem.—Arising from their peculiar nature, there has always been a Synoptic problem, ever since the 3 Gospels appeared together in the Canon of the NT. No one could read these Gospels consecutively with attention, without being aware of the resemblances and differences in their contents. Each writer sets forth his own account without reference to the other two, and, with the partial exception of Luke (1 1–4), does not tell his readers anything about the sources of his Gospel. A problem thus arose as to the relations of the three to one another, and the problem, though it approaches a solution, is not yet solved. A history of the Synoptic problem will be found in outline in many recent works; the most elaborate and best is in Zahn's Intro, III. In it Zahn briefly indicates what the problem was as it presented itself to the church in the earlier centuries, and gives in detail the history of the discussion from the time of Lessing (1778) to the present day. It is not possible within the limits of this art. to refer otherwise than briefly to these discussions, but it may be remarked that, as the discussion went on, large issues were raised; every attempt at solution seemed only to add to the difficulty of finding an adequate one; and at length it was seen that no more complex problem was ever set to literary criticism than that presented by the similarities and differences of the Synoptic Gospels.

2. Proposed Solutions

Of the hypotheses which seek to account for these resemblances and differences, the following are the most important. (1) The hypothesis of oral tradition: This theory has rather fallen into disfavor among recent critics. Dr. Stanton, e.g., says, "The relations between the first 3 Gospels cannot be adequately explained simply by the influence of oral tradition" (Gospels as Hist. Documents, II, 17; similarly Moffatt, op. cit. 180 ff). Briefly stated, the theory is this. It assumes that each of the evangelists wrote independently of the others, and derived the substance of his writing, not from written sources, but from oral narratives of sayings and doings of Jesus, which, through dint of repetition, had assumed a relatively fixed form. The teaching of the apostles, first given in Jerus, repeated in the catechetical schools (cf Lk 1 4, RV), and intrusted to the trained memories of the Christian converts, is held to be sufficient to account for the phenomena of the 3 Gospels. The oral Gospel took its essential form in Pal, and written editions of it would by and by appear in more or less complete form (Lk 1 1). The first distinguished advocate of the oral hypothesis was Gieseler (1818). It was upheld in Britain by Alford and Westcott, and is today advocated, with modifications, by Dr. A. Wright in his Synopsis of the Gospels in Gr (2d ed, 1908).

(2) The mutual use hypothesis: As old as Augustine, this hypothesis, which assumes the use of one of the Gospels by the other two, has been frequently advocated by scholars of repute in the history of criticism. There have been many variations of the theory. Each of the 3 Gospels has been put first, each second, and each third, and each in turn has been regarded as the source of the others. In fact, all possible permutations (6 in number) have been exhausted. As the hypothesis has few advocates at the present day, it is not necessary to give a minute account of these permutations and combinations. Two of them which may be regarded as finally excluded are (a) those which put Lk first; and (b) those which put Mk last (the view of Augustine; in modern times, of F. Baur and the Tübingen school).

(3) The hypothesis of sources: This is the theory which may be said to hold the field at the present time. The tendency in criticism is toward the acceptance of two main sources for the Synoptic Gospels. (a) One source is a Gospel like, if not identical with, the canonical Gospel of Mk. As regards this 2d Gospel there is a consensus of opinion that it is prior to the other two, and the view that the 2d and 3d used it as a source is described as the one solid result of literary criticism. Eminent critics of various schools of thought are agreed on this point (cf W. C. Allen, St. Matthew, Pref. vii; F. C. Burkitt, Gospel History and Its Transmission, 37). It has been shown that most of the contents of Mk have been embodied in the other two, that the order of events in Mk has been largely followed by Mt and Lk, and that the departures from the style of Mk can be accounted for by the hypothesis of editorial amendment. (b) The other source (now commonly named Q) is found first by an examination of the matter not contained in the 2d Gospel, which is common to Mt and Lk. While there are differences as to the extent and character of the 2d source, there is something like general agreement as to its existence. It is not agreed as to whether this source contained narratives of events, as well as sayings, or whether it was a book of sayings alone (the former is thought to be the more probable view), nor is it agreed as to whether it contained an account of the Passion week (on the differing views of the extent of Q, see Moffatt, op. cit., 197 ff); but while disagreement exists as to these and other points, the tendency, as said, is to accept a "two-source" theory in some form as the only sufficient account of the phenomena of the Gospels.

(4) Other sources: To make the source-theory probable, some account must be taken of other sources beyond the two enumerated above. Both the 1st and the 3d Gospels contain material not borrowed from these sources. There is the fore-history of Mt 1 2, which belongs to that Gospel alone, with other things likewise recorded by Mt only (9 27–34; 12 22; 14 28–33; 17 24 ff, etc). Then not only has Lk a fore-history (chs 1, 2), but a large part of his Gospel consists of material found nowhere else (e.g. 7 11–16.36–50; 10 25 ff; parables in chs 15, 16, 18 1–14, etc). This Sondergut of Mt and Lk will be more appropriately treated in the arts. which deal with these Gospels respectively. Here it is sufficient to point out that the criticism of the Synoptic Gospels is not complete till it has found a probable source (a) for what is common to them all, (b) for what is common to any two of them, and (c) for what is peculiar to each. The literature on the subject is so voluminous that only a few references can be given. In addition to those named, the following works may suffice to set forth the present condition of the Synoptic problem: B. Weiss, Intro to NT, and other works; Harnack, Luke the Physician, The Sayings of Jesus, The Acts of the Apostles, Date of the Acts of the Apostles and of the Synoptic Gospels (ETs); Wellhausen, Einleitung in die drei ersten Evangelien, and works on each of the Synoptic Gospels, esp. Studies in the Synoptic Problem, edited by Dr. Sanday.

III. Literary Analysis and Oral Tradition.—

1. The Problem Not Solely a Literary One

Looked at merely as a problem of literary analysis, it is scarcely possible to advance farther than has been done in the works of Harnack, of Sanday and his coadjutors, and of Stanton, referred to above. The work done has been of the most patient and persevering kind. No clue has been neglected, no labor has been spared, and the interrelations of the three Gospels have been almost exhaustively explored. Yet the problem remains unsolved. For it must not be forgotten that the materials of the Synoptic Gospels were in existence before they assumed a written form. Literary analysis is apt to forget this obvious fact, and to proceed by literary comparison alone. The Gospel was confessedly at first and for some years a spoken Gospel, and this fact has to be taken into account in any adequate attempt to understand the phenomena. It is not enough to say with Dr. Stanton that "the relations of the first three Gospels cannot be adequately explained simply by the influence of oral tradition"; for the question arises, Can the relations between the first three Gospels be explained simply by the results of literary analysis, be it as exhaustive and thorough as it may? Let it be granted that literary analysis has accomplished a great deal; that it has almost compelled assent to the two-source hypothesis; that it has finally made good the priority of Mk; that it has made out a probable source consisting mainly of sayings of Jesus, yet many problems remain which literary analysis cannot touch, at least has not touched. There is the problem of the order of events in the Gospels, which is so far followed by all three. How are we to account for that sequence? Is it sufficient to say, as some do, that Mk set the style of the Gospel narrative, and that the others so far followed that style? All Gospels must follow the method set by Mk, so it is affirmed. But if that is the case, how did Mt and Lk depart from that copy by writing a fore-history? Why did they compile a genealogy? Why did they give so large a space to the sayings of Jesus, and add so much not contained in the Gospel which, on the hypothesis, set the pattern of what a Gospel ought to be? These questions cannot be answered on the hypothesis that the others simply followed a fashion set by Mk. Sometimes the 2d Gospel is described as if it were suddenly launched on the Christian world; as if no one had ever heard of the story contained in it before Mk wrote it. From the nature of the case, it is obvious that the church had knowledge of many of the facts in the life of Christ, and was in possession of much of His teaching before any of the Gospels were written. So much is plain from the Epistles of St. Paul. How many facts about Jesus, and how much of His teaching may be gathered from these epistles, we do not inquire at present. But we do learn much from St. Paul about the historical Jesus.

2. Influence of Oral Instruction

The Christian church in its earlier form arose out of the teaching, example and influence of the apostles at Jerus. It was based on apostolic testimony as to the life, character, teaching, death and resurrection of Jesus Christ. That testimony told the church what Jesus had done, what He had taught, and of the belief of the apostles as to what He was, and what He continued to be. We read that the early church "continued stedfastly in the apostles' teaching and fellowship" (Acts 2 42). The "teaching" consisted of reminiscences of the Lord, of interpretations of the facts about Jesus and of agreements between these and the OT. The first instruction given to the church was oral. Of this fact there can be no doubt. How long oral teaching continued we may not say, but it is likely that it continued as long as the apostles dwelt together at Jerus. To them an appeal could constantly be made. There was also the strictly catechetical teaching given to the converts, and this teaching would be given after the manner to which they had been accustomed in their earlier education. It consisted mainly in committing accurately to memory, and in repetition from memory (see CATECHIST; CATECHUMEN). There would thus be a stricter tradition, as it was taught in the catechetical classes, and a looser tradition which consisted of as much as the people could carry with them from the preaching of the apostles at the weekly assemblies. Those, besides, who were present at the day of Pentecost, and others present at the feasts at Jerus, who had passed under Christian influence, would carry with them on their return to their homes some knowledge of the life and death, resurrection and ascension of Jesus. It may have been a meager Gospel that these carried with them to Antioch, to Rome, or to other cities in which the diaspora dwelt. But that they did carry a Gospel with them is plain, for from their testimony arose the church at Antioch, where the Christians had without question a knowledge of the Gospel, which informed their faith and guided their action.

IV. Order of Events and Time of Happenings in the Synoptic Gospels.—

1. Range of Apostolic Witness

It is known from Acts that the main topic of the preaching of the apostles was the resurrection of the Lord. "With great power gave the apostles their witness of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus" (Acts 4 33). It is evident, however, that the apostolic witness would not be limited to the events of the Passion week, or to the fact of the resurrection. There would arise a thirst for information regarding the life of Jesus, what He had done, what He had said, what manner of life He had lived, and what teaching He had given. Accounts of Him and of His work would be given by the apostles, and once these accounts were given, they would continue to be given in the same form. Tell a story to a child and he will demand that it be always given in the form in which he first knew it. Hearers of a story are impatient of variations in the subsequent telling of it. Memory is very tenacious and very conservative.

2. Bearing on Order

It is clear that the first lessons of the apostles were accounts of the Passion week, and of the resurrection. But it went backward to events and incidents in the life of Jesus, and as we read the Synoptic Gospels, we soon see that the order was dictated by the events themselves. They are grouped together for no other reason than that they happened so. Most of the incidents are hung on a geographical thread. In the 2d Gospel, which seems to preserve most faithfully the traditional order, this is obvious to every attentive reader; but in all the 3 Gospels many of the narratives go in well-established cycles. To take only one illustration, where many might be instanced, the healing of the woman with the issue of blood is represented as occurring in the course of the walk to the house of Jairus (Mk 5 21 ff). The only explanation is that this was the actual mode of its happening. Events happened, incidents arose, in the course of the journeys of Jesus and His disciples, words were also spoken, and in the memories of the disciples, when the journey was recalled, there arose also what had happened in the course of the journey. In fact, as we follow the journey through Galilee, to the coasts of Tyre and Sidon, through Samaria, down the valley of the Jordan, through Jericho to Jerus, we find that the grouping of the material of the Gospels is determined by the facts. Most of what is recorded happened in the course of the journeys, and was borne in the memories of the disciples in the order of its happening. The order, then, is not arbitrary, nor is it the product of reflection; it is the outcome of the facts. It is true that in pursuance of their several plans, Lk sometimes, Mt frequently, deserts the order of Mk, but it is noteworthy that they never do so together. As Professor Burkitt says, "Mt and Lk never agree against Mk in transposing a narrative. Lk sometimes deserts the order of Mk, and Mt often does so; but in these cases Mk is always supported by the remaining Gospel" (op. cit., 36). In Mt, after 19 1, the events follow each other quite as in Mk.

3. Time of Happenings

When one studies the rather kaleidoscopic political geography of Pal in the first 40 years of our era, he will find many confirmations of the historic situation in the Synoptic Gospels. The birth of Jesus was in the time of Herod the Great, when the whole of Pal was under one government. After the death of Herod, Pal was under several rulers. Archelaus had possession of Judaea until the year 9 AD. Galilee was under Herod Antipas until the year 37, and the tetrarchy of Philip had a distinct government of its own. About the year 40 Pal was again under one government under Herod Agrippa. Now it is clear that the events of the Gospels happened while Herod Antipas ruled in Galilee and Peraea, and while Pilate was procurator in Judaea (see CHRONOLOGY OF NT, and JESUS CHRIST). Nor is the significance of this environment exhausted by the reference to the time. As Professor Burkitt has shown (op. cit., in his chapter entitled "Jesus in Exile"), in the itinerary recorded in Mk 5, the parts avoided are the dominions of Herod Antipas. It is said in Mk 3 6, "And the Pharisees went out, and straightway with the Herodians took counsel against him, how they might destroy him." The significance of this alliance between the Pharisees and the Herodians is well drawn out by Professor Burkitt in the work cited above. It is simply noted by Mk, and on it the evangelist makes no remark. But the conspiracy had a great effect on the work of Jesus. A little later we find Jesus no more in any of the synagogues. He devotes Himself to the training of the Twelve, and is outside of the dominions of Herod Antipas. It is not to be forgotten that during these months Jesus is an exile from His own land, and it was during that period of exile that the issue of His work became clear to Him, and from the time of the great confession at Caesarea-Philippi He began to tell His disciples of the decease He should accomplish at Jerus (Mt 16 13 ff ||).

V. Dating of the Synoptic Gospels.—The question as to the dates at which the Synoptic Gospels appear in a published form may more suitably be dealt with in connection with the arts. on the separate Gospels. It need only be observed here that opinion is tending toward much earlier dates than were common till lately. By all but extreme writers it is now admitted that the first 3 Gospels fall well within the limits of the apostolic age. In the Preface to his work on Luke (1906), Harnack reminded his readers that 10 years before he had told them that "in the criticism of the sources of the oldest Christianity we are in a movement backward to tradition." The dates he formerly favored were, for Mk between 65 and 70 AD, for Mt between 70 and 75, for Lk between 78 and 93. Harnack's more recent pronouncement as to the date of Acts, which he states with all the emphasis of italics, "It seems now to be established beyond question that both books of this great historical work were written while St. Paul was yet alive" (Date of the Acts and the Synoptic Gospels, 124, ET), must have a determining influence on critical opinion. If Acts were written during the lifetime of St. Paul (cf Acts 28 30 f), then the 3d Gospel must have been written earlier. It is likely that Lk had all his material in hand during the imprisonment of St. Paul at Caesarea. If he made use of the 2d Gospel, then Mk must have had a still earlier date, and the whole problem of the dating of the Gospels is revolutionized. The essential thing is that the 3 Gospels were probably written and published before the destruction of Jerus (70 AD). There is nothing in their contents that makes this view untenable.

1. Return to Earlier Dating

2. The Material Still Older

It is still to be remembered, however, that the materials of which the Gospels are composed existed before they were put into a written form. Every discussion must take note of that fact. The lit. of the NT presupposes just such accounts of the life of Jesus as we find in the Synoptic Gospels, and readers of the Gospels have a right to rest on their veracity and sufficiency as accounts of Jesus, of what He was, what He said, and what He did. They are their own best witnesses.

VI. The Messianic Idea in Its Bearings on Historicity of the Gospels.—In a striking passage in his Das Evangelium Marci (65, 66), Wellhausen vividly sets forth the significant contrast between the Jewish and the Christian conceptions of the Messiah. We quote the words, notwithstanding the fact that Wellhausen does not regard the passage, Mk 8 31 ff, as historical. With him what is set forth there is not the figure of the historical Jesus, but a picture of the persecuted church.

1. The Jewish and the Christian Messiah

> "The confession of Peter, 'Thou art the Messiah,' affords," he says, "the occasion for the setting forth of what up to this time was latent. He has elicited the confession and accepted it. Nevertheless He accepts it with a correction; a correction that follows as a matter of course. He is not the Messiah who will restore the kingdom of Israel, but another Messiah altogether. Not to set up the kingdom does He go to Jerus, but He goes in order to be crucified. Through sorrow and death He goes into glory, and only by this way can others also enter. The kingdom of God is no Judaistic kingdom; the kingdom is destined only for some chosen individuals, for disciples. The thought of the possibility of a metanoia of the people has wholly disappeared. Into the place of a command to repent addressed to all steps the command to follow, and that can be obeyed only by a very few. The conception of following loses now its proper forces and takes a higher meaning. It does not mean what it meant up to this time, viz. to accompany and to follow Him during His lifetime; it overflows that meaning; one is to follow Him even unto death. The following is an imitatio possible only after His death, and this is to be attained only by a very few. One must bear his cross after Him. . . . . The situation of the oldest congregation and its tone is here foreshadowed by Jesus as He goes to meet his fate."

A similar passage occurs in the Einleitung, which ends with the significant sentence, "All these are noteworthy signs of the time in which He takes His standpoint" (81).

2. Originality of the Christian Conception

Elsewhere Wellhausen admits that the sections of the Gospels following the scene at Caesarea-Philippi contain what was known as the distinctive Gospel of the apostolic church. But this Gospel owed its origin to the apostolic church itself. It is a question of the highest importance, and the answer cannot be determined by mere literary criticism: Is the Christian conception of the Messiah due to Jesus? or is it due to the reflection of the church? Which is the more probable? It is agreed, Wellhausen being witness, that the Christian conception was subversive of the Jewish, that the two were in contradiction in many ways. One can understand the Christian conception, and its triumph over the Jewish among the Christian people, if it had been set forth by the Master; but it is unintelligible as a something which originated in the congregation itself. The conception of a crucified Messiah, of a suffering Saviour, was a conception which was, during the years of His earthly ministry, in the mind of Jesus alone. It was not in the minds of the disciples, until He had risen from the dead. And it was not in the minds of His contemporaries. But it was the ruling conception in the Jerus church as it is in the Epistles of St. Paul. No: the conception of the suffering Saviour was not the invention of the church, nor did it rise from her thought of her own needs; it was a gift to her from the suffering and risen Lord. Not without a great impulse, nor without a strong source of persuasion, do men displace notions which they have cherished for generations, and substitute notions which are contradictory and subversive of those fiercely and firmly held.

We take these chapters therefore as historical, and as descriptive of the historical Jesus. If we can do so, then the matter is intelligible, not otherwise. It is also to be observed in this relation that the needs of the church are new needs. There is no provision in the NT for the needs of the natural man. The critical view often puts the cart before the horse, and this is one illustration of the fact. The needs of the church are the creation of Christ. They are new needs, or needs only imperfectly felt by humanity before Jesus came.

3. The Messianic Hope

Be the needs of the church as great as they may, they are not creative; they are only responsive to the higher call. Nor is it a possible hypothesis that lies at the basis of the criticism of Wellhausen and of many others. Since the time of Baur it has often been said or assumed that it was the Messianic hope that gave concreteness to Christianity; that through the prevalence of the Messianic hope, Christianity was enabled to enter on its career of victory. This is another case of the hysteron proteron. It is the historical Jesus that has given concreteness and definiteness to the Messianic conceptions which were current in His time. Because at the heart of the Christian conception there was this concrete gracious figure, and because of the commanding influence of Jesus Christ, this form of Messianism entered into human life, flourished and endured, and is with us today. Other forms of Messianism have only an antiquarian value. They may be discussed as of literary interest, but their practical significance is as nothing. No doubt Messianic categories were ransacked by the church to see if they could be used in order more fully to set forth the significance of Jesus Christ. But the essence of the matter did not lie in them but in Him, whom they had known, loved and served. It is time that a newer critical assumption should be found than the obsolete, worn-out one that the church invented the Christ. We know a little of the early church, and we know its immaturity and its limitations. We have learned something, too, of the Jews at the time of Our Lord, and we note that in the Gospels their limitations have been transcended, their immaturity has been overcome, and how? By the fact of Christ. He is so great that He must be real.

VII. The OT in Its Bearing on the Synoptic Gospels.—It is always to be remembered that the OT was the Bible of the early Christians. They accepted it as the Word of God, and as authoritative for the guidance of life and conduct. It is one thing to admit and assert this; it is another thing to say that the story of the OT molded and directed the story of Jesus as it is in the Synoptic Gospels. This has been widely asserted, but without adequate proof. As a matter of fact Christianity, when it accepted the OT as the word of God, interpreted it in a fashion which had not been accepted before. It interpreted it in the light of Jesus Christ. Tendencies, facts, meanings, which had been in the OT came into light, and the Bible of the Christians was a Bible which testified of Christ. That on which the Jews laid stress passed into the background, and that which they had neglected came into prominence. This view is set forth by St. Paul: "Unto this day, whensoever Moses is read, a veil lieth upon their heart" (2 Cor 3 15). Or as it is put in Lk, "O foolish men, and slow of heart to believe in all that the prophets have spoken! Behooved it not the Christ to suffer these things, and to enter into his glory?" (24 25 f). In the Christian interpretation stress was laid on meanings which Jewish readers had neglected, and so the church read the OT in the new light, and things formerly hidden leaped into view. So the suffering servant of Jeh became for them the keystone of the OT, and the ritual sacrifices and ceremonies of the OT obtained a new meaning. The story of Israel and of its patriarchs, lawgivers, priests, kings and prophets, became full of significance for the new religion, and its psalms and prophecies were searched because they testified of Christ. This is not the place to inquire into the truth of the Christian interpretation, but the fact is undeniable. The inference is that the OT did not, as it was understood by the Jews, influence the conceptions which the church had of Christ; rather the influence of Christ, His commanding personality, and His history gave a new meaning to the OT, a meaning undreamt of before. The Epistle to the Hebrews might have as an alternative title, "How to find Christ in the OT." So powerful was the impression made on the disciples by the personality of Jesus, by His whole demeanor, by His teaching, His life, death and resurrection, that they saw all things in the light of it. The difficulty we have in justifying the references to prophecy, in the light of historical criticism, is a testimony to the fact that the prophecy did not dictate the fact; it was the fact that dictated the accommodation of the prophecy. In this relation also, the supreme fact is the personality of Jesus.

VIII. The Jesus of the Gospels as Thinker.—

1. Ethics of Jesus

Turning from the conception of the suffering Saviour in the Synoptics, we come to the aspect of Jesus as teacher and thinker, and here also we find abundant evidence of the historical character of the Gospel presentation. As the ethics of Jesus are treated in another art., it is sufficient to say here that the conception of the ethical man and His conduct set forth in His teaching is of unusual breadth, and when worked out in detail, yields an ideal of man in himself, and in relation to others, which transcends all other ethical teaching known to mankind. This, too, we must trace to His unique personality, and not to the reflection of the church.

2. Jesus as Thinker

A glance may be taken at Jesus under His more general aspect as thinker. As thinker, Jesus stands alone. He speaks with authority, and whoever understands must obey. The Synoptic Gospels, in this respect, are unique. There is nothing like them in literature. Not even in the Bible is there anything to compare with them. Even in the other books of the NT we do not find anything like the attitude of Jesus to the common things of life. The world's literature shows no parallel to the parables of the Gospels. Here, at any rate, we are on safe ground in saying that these are not due to the reflection of the church. They have an individual stamp which accredits them as the product of one mind. But a great deal more may be said on the characteristic features of the thinking of Jesus. He is the only thinker who goes straight from the common things of daily life and daily experience into the deepest mysteries of life. The deepest thoughts which man can think are suggested to Him by what everybody sees or does. It is not easy within reasonable limits to do justice to this feature of the Synoptic Gospels. Jesus is at home amid the common things and common occupations of life, because He discerns the Father's presence in them all. What a series of pictures of the world, and of occupations of men, could be gathered from these Gospels! This feature of them was neglected until men under the teaching of poets and painters returned into sympathy with external Nature. We are only beginning to see what wealth, from this point of view, is in the Gospels. Poetic sympathy with Nature is a comparatively modern attainment, yet it is in the Gospels. Wind and weather, mountain and valley, seedtime and harvest, summer and winter, sowing and reaping, buying and selling, all are there, transfigured into higher meanings, and made vocal of the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven. Other thinkers rise gradually, and by many steps, from common experience, into what they have to describe of the higher thought and wider generalizations through which they seek to interpret the mystery of life and of the universe. But this thinker needs no middle terms. He sees, e.g., a woman preparing bread for the use of the family, and in this process perceives the mystery of the kingdom of heaven. Whenever He touches on these common things, immediately they are transfigured. They become luminous with the presence of the spiritual world, and earth becomes full of heaven, and every bush is aflame with God.

We note these things because they have a close bearing on the origin and character of the Synoptic Gospels. They bear the stamp of a unique, a creative personality. Be the processes through which the materials of the Gospels have passed what they may, yet these have not obliterated nor blurred the essential characteristics of that unique personality. When the comparisons of the similarities and differences of the Gospels have been exhausted, the problem of their origin remains, and that problem can be solved only by the recognition of a creative personality who alike by word and work was unlike any other that the world has ever seen.

IX. The Problem of the Gospels.—The Jesus of the Gospels is the Son of God. Stated in its highest form, the problem which the evangelists had in hand was how to represent a Divine being under human conditions, and to set Him forth in such a way that in that presentation there should be nothing unworthy of the Divine, and nothing inconsistent with the human conditions under which He worked and lived. This was the greatest problem ever set to literature, and how the evangelists presented and solved it is found in the Gospels. There it has been solved. Even a writer like Bousset admits: "Already for Mk is Jesus not only the Messiah of the Jewish people, but the miraculous eternal Son of God, whose glory shone in the world. . . . . For the faith of the community, which the oldest evangelist already shares, Jesus is the miraculous Son of God, in whom men believe, whom men put wholly on the side of God" (Was wissen wir von Jesus? 54, 57). The contrast between the Jesus of the Synoptics and the Pauline and Johannine Christ, so often emphasized, thus begins to disappear. The purpose of the Synoptics, as of Jn, is to lead men to "believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God," that, believing, they "may have life in his name" (Jn 20 31).

GOTHIC, goth′ik, VERSION. See VERSIONS.

GOTHOLIAS, goth-ŏ-lī′as (Γοθολίας, Gotholías): Father of Josias, one of the sons of Elam who returned from Babylon with Ezra (1 Esd 8 33). The name corresponds to Athaliah, the Gr G being substituted for the Heb guttural ʿayin, as in Gomorrha, Gaza, etc. Taken with 2 K 11 1, the name would seem to have been used for both men and women.

GOTHONIEL, gŏ-thō′ni-el (Γοθονιήλ, Gothoniḗl): The same as Othniel, father of Chabris who was one of the governors of the city of Bethulia (Jth 6 15).

GOURD, gōrd, gōōrd (קִיקָיוֹן, ḳīḳāyōn): The Vulg has hedera ("ivy"), which is impossible. Philologically ḳīḳāyōn appears to be connected with κίκι (kíki), which was the Egyp name for the castor oil plant (Ricinus communis). This grows plentifully all over the Orient, and under favorable conditions may reach a height of 10 to 15 ft.; its larger leaves afford a grateful shade. The requirements of the narrative in Jon 4 6 ff are, however, much more suitably met by the "bottle gourd" (Cucurbita lagenaria), the Arab. ḳarʿah. This is a creeping, vinelike plant which may frequently be seen trained over the rough temporary sun-shelters erected in fields or by the roadside in Pal and Mesopotamia.

GOURD, WILD, wīld (פַּקֻּעֹת שָׂדֶה, paḳḳuʿōth sādheh, 2 K 4 39): The √ פָּקַע, pāḳaʿ, means "to split" or "burst open," and on this ground these "wild gourds" have been identified with the fruit of the squirting cucumber (Ecballium elaterium). This little gourd, 1½ to 2 in. long, when fully ripe falls suddenly when touched or shaken, the bitter, irritating juice is squirted to a considerable distance, and the seeds are thrown all around. It is exceedingly common in Pal, and its familiar poisonous properties, as a drastic cathartic, made it unlikely that under any circumstances its fruit could be mistaken for any edible gourd; it is, too, in no way vinelike ("wild vine," 2 K 4 39) in appearance; the stem is stiff and upright, and there are no tendrils. The traditional plant, Cucumis prophetarium, which grows in the desert, and has very small "gourds," has nothing really to recommend it. By far the most probable plant is the Colocynth (Citrullus colocynthis), belonging like the last two to N.O. Cucurbitaceae. This view has the support of the LXX and Vulg. It is a vinelike plant which spreads over the ground or attaches itself by its spiral tendrils to other plants. The rounded "gourds" are 3 in. or more in diameter, and contain a pulp intensely bitter and, in any but minute quantities, extremely poisonous.

Colocynth (Citrullus colocynthis).

GOVERNMENT, guv′ĕrn-ment: The government of the Hebrews varied at different periods, of which we may distinguish seven: (1) the nomadic period, from the Exodus to the entrance into Pal; (2) the period of transition from nomadic to civil life; (3) the monarchy; (4) the period of subjection to other oriental nations; (5) the period from Ezra to the Greeks; (6) Greek rule; (7) Roman rule.

1. The Nomadic Period

The government of the primitive period is that proper to nomadic tribes composed of families and clans, in no wise peculiar to the Hebrews, but shared in its essential features by the most diverse peoples at a corresponding stage of civilization. Though we might draw illustrations from many sources, the government of the Bedouins, Sem nomads inhabiting the steppes of Arabia, affords the most instructive parallel. In the patriarchal state the family is the household (including slaves and concubines) of the father, who is its head, having power of life and death over his children (Gen 22; Jgs 11 31 ff). A clan is a collection of families under a common chieftain, chosen for his personal qualifications, such as prowess and generous hospitality. The composition of the clan was essentially shifting, subject, according to circumstances, to the loss or accession of individuals and families. Although the possession of the same grazing-grounds doubtless played a large part in determining the complexion of the clan, the fiction of descent from a common ancestor was maintained, even when kinship was established by the blood covenant. In all probability community of worship, which cemented the tribe, served as the most effective bond of union also in the clan. Vestiges of such clan cults are still to be detected (1 S 20 5 ff; Jgs 18 19). The familiar tradition of the twelve tribes must not be allowed to blind us to the evidence that the tribe also was not constant. Mention of the Kenites (Jgs 1 16) and the list of tribes in the Song of Deborah (Jgs 5) remind us that such organizations vanished. In the readjustment incident to the change from the pastoral life of the nomad to that of the settled agricultural population of Pal, many units were doubtless shifted from one tribe to another, and the same result may be assumed as following from the endless strife between the tribes before and during the period of the kings. The large and powerful tribe of Judah seems to have originated comparatively late. The union of the tribes under the leadership of Moses was essentially similar to the formation of a new tribe out of a group of clans actuated by a desire to accomplish a common end. Many such temporary aggregations must have originated, only to succumb to the centrifugal forces of jealousy and conflicting interests. Even after the entrance of the Hebrews into Pal, their history for long is that of kindred tribes, rather than that of a nation. The leadership of Moses rested on personal, not on constitutional, authority, and was rendered precarious by the claims of family and of clan, as in the case of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram (Nu 16). The authority of Moses naturally extended to the administration of justice, as well as to matters pertaining to war and religion. He appointed officers to assist him in this judicial function (Ex 18 21 ff), but the laws according to which they rendered judgment were those of custom and usage, not those of a written code. As among the tribal chieftains, important matters were referred to the leader, who, in cases of doubt or in default of recognized custom, resorted to the lot or to the oracle.

2. The Period of Transition

When the nomad tribes settled in Pal to become an agricultural people, there ensued a period of unrest due to the necessity for readjustment to changed conditions. The old tribal organization, admirably adapted to the former, ill suited the new requirements. These may be summed up in the demand for the substitution of local organization, based on the rights of individuals, for the tribal government, which had regard solely to the interests of family, clan and tribe. Such readjustment did not, of course, at once ensue, but came piecemeal in answer to the gradually realized wants of the community. Nor was the development entirely from within, but was unquestionably in large measure influenced by the institutions existing among the Canaanite population, only a part of which had been expelled by the invaders. Although the tribes still clung to the notion of descent from a common ancestor, which was embodied in the accepted genealogies with their filiation of clans into tribes and of tribes into a nation, that which henceforth passed as a "tribe" was less an aggregation of kindred units than a geographical unit or group of units. The times were turbulent, disturbed by contending elements within and by foes without the tribes. Then it was that there arose a class of chieftains of strongly marked character, called by a new name. The "judge" (שֹׁפֵט, shōphēṭ) was not the ruler of a nation, but the chieftain of a tribe, winning and maintaining his authority by virtue of his personal prowess. The cases of Gideon and Abimelech (Jgs 8, 9) show that the authority of the "judge" was not hereditary. Agreeably to the generally changed conditions, the "elders" (זְקֵנִים, z^{e}ḳēnīm), who were formerly heads of families or kindreds, now came, possibly under the influence of the Canaanites, to be constituted an aristocratic upper class, with certain functions as administrative officers and councilors. Cities also grew and acquired importance, so that the adjacent hamlets were subordinated to them, probably even ruled from them as executive centers. In all this there is a certain similarity to the process by which, in the period just preceding the beginning of real history, Athens became the metropolis of Attica, and conventional tribes supplanted those based on kinship, while the rise of the purely local organization of the demos led speedily to the appearance of the "tyrants." The high places of clans and tribes continued to be frequented, and certain "seers" (1 S 9 6 ff) enjoyed considerable prestige by virtue of their peculiar relation to the tribal god.

3. The Monarchy

While the succession of tribal chieftains and of the "judges" depended on fitness and call of God, the principle of heredity is essential to the institution of monarchy, which originated in the desire to regulate the succession with a view to having an assured authoritative leadership. This principle could not, of course, be invoked in the appointment of Saul, the first king (מֶלֶךְ, melekh), who won this distinction in virtue of his personal prowess, supported by the influence of Samuel directed of God. His son Ishbosheth ruled two years over Israel, but lost his throne through the disaffection of his subjects (2 S 2–4). The accession of David, king of Judah, to the throne of all Israel was likewise exceptional, owing as much to the character of the heir presumptive, as to his own qualifications. Solomon promised of God and his father David succeeded by right of heredity with the support of the military and religious leaders. In the Southern Kingdom of Judah, heredity was henceforth observed because of its homogeneity and the consequent absence of internal discord; whereas the principle often failed in the turbulent Northern Kingdom of Israel, which was distracted by tribal jealousies. But even when not effectually operative, heredity was recognized as constituting a claim to the succession, although the popular voice, which had been supreme in the institution of the monarchy, was a power always to be reckoned with.

(1) Royal prerogatives.—The history and functions of monarchy defined the prerogatives and duties of the king. Just as the head of the family, or the chieftain of a tribe, functioned as representative of those subject to him in matters of religion, war, and the administration of justice, so also was it with the king. In all these spheres he was supreme, exercising his authority either personally or through representatives who thus became part of the royal establishment. It is to be noted that the sacerdotal or sacral character of the king, which was merely an extension of his privileges as individual and head of a household, was not emphasized among the Hebrews to a like extent as among other oriental peoples; and the priests whom he appointed were perhaps in the first instance court chaplains, though in time they came to assume greater authority. The responsibility of the king for the public safety carried with it the obligation to guard the state treasures, to which the treasures of the temples were felt to belong; and it was his privilege to use them when necessary for defence. The levying of taxes, also, and the collection and use of revenues from various sources likewise fell of necessity to the king and his representatives.

(2) Officers.—In regard to the constitution of the king's court under Saul and David we learn comparatively little; even touching that of Solomon we are not fully informed, although we know that it must have been far removed from the original simplicity. We may classify the known officers as follows: (a) religious: priests (2 S 8 17; 20 23 ff); (b) household: cupbearer (1 K 10 5); master of the vestry (2 K 10 22); master of the household (1 K 4 6), who probably was a eunuch (1 K 22 9 m; 2 K 8 6 m; 9 32); (c) state: scribe or clerk (2 S 8 17; 20 25, etc); recorder, or prompter (1 K 4 3); king's counselor (2 S 15 12); and, perhaps, the king's friend (2 S 15 37; 16 16); overseer of taskwork (2 S 20 24); (d) military: commander-in-chief of the army (2 S 8 16); commander of the king's guards (?) (2 S 8 18; 20 23).

(3) Fiscal institutions.—The simplicity of Saul's rule was such as to make slight demands upon the resources of the people. He lived in the manner of a tribal chieftain on his ancestral estate, receiving from his subjects voluntary gifts (1 S 10 27; 16 20), and also, without doubt, his due share of the booty. Whether he instituted a regular tax (cf 1 S 17 25) is not certain. With the growth and prosperity of the nation, David changed the character of the court, imitating in a measure the state of other oriental potentates. It is not clear whether he levied a regular tax, although it may be surmised that he had it in view, together with the regulation of taskwork, in ordaining the census taken in his time (2 S 24 1 ff). We know that he received his portion of the booty (2 S 8 11; 12 30). The increasing luxury of Solomon's court required the imposition of additional taxes. It is probable that some income was derived from the enforced cultivation of crown lands (1 S 8 12), although the taskwork, which became extremely burdensome and subsequently provoked the secession of the Northern Kingdom, was chiefly applied to public works. The tribute of subject peoples (1 K 4 21) was considerable (1 K 10 14). We now for the first time hear of taxes upon caravans and merchants, although it was in all probability a source of income even in the time of the nomad chieftains; there was also revenue from the carrying trade of his merchant fleet (1 K 10 11.22) and from the trade in horses and chariots carried on with Egypt (1 K 10 28 ff). Solomon also divided his kingdom into twelve provinces commanded by prefects, who should provide victuals for the king and his household: each prefect had to make provision for a month in the year (1 K 4 7 ff). It does not appear whether Judah, which is not included in the list of provinces, was as a mark of special favor exempted from this tax, or whether the omission is to be otherwise explained. The seizure of the vineyard of Naboth by Ahab (1 K 21) makes it seem not improbable that the property of persons condemned on certain charges was confiscate to the king.

(4) Administration of justice.—The king, like the tribal chieftain of the steppes, still sat in judgment, but chiefly in matters of moment; less important cases were decided by the prefects of provinces and other officers. Under the earlier kings there was no code except the Book of the Covenant (Ex 20–23), but judgment was rendered on the basis of the law of custom or usage, the function of the judge being essentially that of an arbiter. For the later code see DEUTERONOMY.

(5) Religion.—The king was regarded as the natural representative of his people before God; but while he did exercise certain sacerdotal functions in person, such offices were generally performed by the priest whom he had appointed.

(6) Secular administration.—The authority of the king in matters of state was exercised partly by him in person, partly through his ministers, the "princes" (1 K 4 2 ff). Among these functions are to be classed the communication with subject and foreign princes and the direction of the taskwork, which was employed for public improvements, partly military, as in the fortification of cities, partly religious, as in the building of the temple. Local affairs had always been left largely to the tribes and their subdivisions, but, with the gradual increase of royal authority, the king sought to exercise it more and more in the conduct of the village communities.

Conversely, the "elders of the people," as the (albeit aristocratic) representatives of the communes, occasionally had a voice even in larger matters of state.

4. Israel under Oriental Potentates The principle of local autonomy was widely observed in the oriental states, which concerned themselves chiefly about political and military organization and about the collection of revenues. Hence there is no occasion for surprise on finding that the Jews enjoyed a large measure of autonomy during the period of their subjection to other oriental powers and that even during the exile they resorted, in matters of dispute, to their own representatives for judgment. Under Pers rule Pal formed part of the satrapy lying W. of the Euphrates and had, for a time, its own governor.

5. After the Restoration Ezra and Nehemiah endeavored to introduce a new code, which, after a period of perhaps two centuries, established a dual form of government subject to the supreme authority of the suzerain power. By the new code the secular officers were subordinated to the high priest, who thus virtually assumed the position of a constitutional prince, ruling under the Law. The "prince," however, as the representative of the tribes, and the "elders of the people," as the representatives of the communes, continued to exercise a certain limited authority.

6. The Greeks Under the Gr rulers of Egypt and Syria the Jews continued to enjoy a large measure of autonomy, still maintaining in general the type of internal government formulated under Ezra and Nehemiah. We now hear of a council of "elders" presided over by the high priest. The latter, appointed by the kings, was recognized as ethnarch by both Ptolemies and Seleucids and held accountable for the payment of the tribute, for the exaction of which he was, of course, empowered to levy taxes. The brief period of political independence under the Hasmoneans (see ASMONEANS) did not materially alter the character of the government, except that the high priest, who had long been a prince in everything but in name, now openly so styled himself. The council of the "elders" survived, although with slightly diminished authority. In other respects the influence of Gr institutions made itself felt.

7. The Romans When Pompey terminated the reign of the Hasmoneans, the government still continued with little essential change. Following the example of the Gr kings, the Romans at first appointed the high priest to the "leadership of the nation." He was soon, however, shorn for a time of his political dignity, the country being divided into five districts, each governed by its "synod"; but Caesar once more elevated the high priest to the office of ethnarch. Under Herod, the high priest and the synedrium (Sanhedrin), appointed or deposed at will as his interests seemed to require, lost much of their former prestige and power. After the death of Herod the land was again divided, and a procurator, subordinate to the governor of Syria, ruled in Judaea, having practical independence in his sphere. In their internal affairs the Jews now, as under former masters, enjoyed a large measure of freedom. The high priest no longer exercising any political authority, the synedrium, of which he was a member, now gained in influence, being in fact an aristocratic council in many respects not unlike the Rom senate. It combined judicial and administrative functions, limited in the exercises of its authority only by the provision that its decisions might be reviewed by the procurator. (See GOVERNOR.) Naturally the outlying jurisdictions were organized on the same model, each with its synedrium competent in local matters. The synedrium at Jerus served also as a governing board for the city.

GOVERNOR, guv'ēr-nēr: The word "governor" is employed in EV in rendering a great variety of Heb and Gr words. In certain cases strict consistency is neither observed nor possible.

1. In the OT In the rendering of Heb terms account has naturally been taken of the tr^s offered in LXX, which, being the work of different hands, is both uneven in quality and inconsistent. But there are inherent difficulties which can never be entirely overcome. First and most important, there is the difficulty arising from our ignorance of many details of the government of the oriental nations to which the terms apply. Hardly less is the embarrassment occasioned by the vague employment of words in indiscriminate reference to persons of superior rank and somehow exercising authority. There is consequently much confusion in the use of titles such as "deputy," "duke," "judge," "lawgiver," "overseer," "prince," "ruler," etc, for which the student may consult the special articles.

(1) אַלּוּף or אַלֻּף, 'allūph, "governor" (RV "chieftain") in Judah (Zec 9 7; 12 5 f).

(2) חוֹקֵק, ḥōḳēḳ (Jgs 5 9; 5 14, AVm "or lawgivers"). The word is variously rendered with "ruler" or "lawgiver" in EV of Gen 49 10; Dt 33 21; Isa 33 22.

(3) מֹשֵׁל, mōshēl, part. of מָשַׁל, māshal, "to be master," "to rule" (Gen 45 26, RV "ruler").

(4) נָשִׂיא, nāsī' (2 Ch 1 2, RV "prince").

(5) סָגָן, ṣāghān (Dnl 3 2 f; Jer 51 23, RVm "or lieutenants"; vs 28.57; Ezk 23 6.12.23). The same word is rendered "rulers" or "deputies" (Isa 41 25; Ezr 9 2; Neh 2 16; 5 7; 7 5; 12 40).

(6) פֶּחָה, peḥāh, is variously used: (a) of the military governor of a province among the Assyrians (Isa 36 9); (b) among the Chaldees (Ezk 23 6.23; Jer 51 23.28.57); (c) among the Persians (Est 3 12; 8 9; 9 3); (d) of the governor-general of the province beyond the River (Euphrates) (Ezr 8 36; Neh 2 7.9); (e) of Nehemiah as subordinate "governor in the land of Judah" under him (Neh 5 14 ff); (f) of Zerubbabel as "governor of Judah" (Hag 1 1.14; 2 2.21); (g) of Solomon's governors (1 K 10 15; 20 24 [in Syria]).

(7) פָּקִיד, pāḳīdh (Jer 20 1, RV "chief officer"). Elsewhere it is rendered "overseer" or "officer" (cf Gen 41 34; 2 K 25 19; Neh 11 9.22).

(8) שַׂר, sar, "governor of the city" (1 K 22 26). Elsewhere commonly rendered "prince."

(9) שַׁלִּיט, shallīṭ (Gen 42 6). Elsewhere rendered "ruler" or "captain."

(10) תִּרְשָׁתָא, tirshāthā'; RV "the governor," AV "the Tirshatha" (Ezr 2 63; Neh 7 70). See TIRSHATHA.

2. In the NT The word "governor" in EV represents an almost equal variety of Gr words. Here again the usage is for the most part lax and untechnical; but since reference is chiefly had to officers of the Rom imperial administration, concerning which we possess ample information, no embarrassment is thereby occasioned. The words chiefly in use for "governor" are derived from √ag, "drive," "lead":

(1) ἡγέομαι, hēgéomai, "lead" (Mt 2 6; of Joseph as grand vizier of Egypt, Acts 7 10).

(2) ἡγεμών, hēgemṓn, "leader" (Mt 10 18; 1 Pet 2 14; of Pilate, Mt 27 2.11.14.15.21.27; of Felix, Acts 23 24.26.33; of Festus, Acts 24 1.10; 26 30).

(3) ἡγεμονεύω, hēgemoneúō, "function as leader" (Lk 2 2; of Pilate, Lk 3 1).

To these are added terms of more specific meaning:

(4) ἐθνάρχης, ethnárchēs, "ethnarch" or "ruler of a nation" (2 Cor 11 32). See GOVERNMENT, 6, 7.

(5) εὐθύνω, euthúnō, "direct," "guide" (Jas 3 4). Here RV properly renders "steersman."

(6) ἀρχιτρίκλινος, architríclinos, "president of a banquet" (Jn 2 8 f, ARV "ruler of the feast").

(7) οἰκονόμος, oikonómos, "steward," "manager of a household or estate" (Gal 4 2, RV "stewards").

It is thus seen that in the NT "governor" in the political sense occurs chiefly in reference to the Rom procurators of Judaea—Pilate, Felix, and Festus. See Pilate; Felix; Festus. It remains for us here to speak briefly of the government of Rom provinces.

Lat provincia signifies a magistrate's sphere of duty or authority, either (a) judicially or legally, defining the scope of his competence, or (b) geographically, designating the territorial limits within which he may exercise authority. It is in the latter sense that we are now considering the word. When, in the 3d cent. BC, Rome began to rule conquered lands outside Italy, each territory was set under the authority of a single magistrate, and hence came to be called a "province." Conquered territories left under the rule of native princes or kings were not so designated, although their government was practically directed by Rome. At first provinces were governed by proconsuls or propraetors (i.e. ex-consuls or ex-praetors); but with the steady multiplication of provinces various expedients became necessary in order to provide governors of suitable rank and dignity. Thus the number of praetors was largely augmented, and the term of possible service as governor was extended. Under Augustus the provinces were parceled out between the emperor and the senate, the former reserving for himself such as seemed to require the maintenance of a considerable armed force. In these the emperor was himself proconsul. Early in the Empire imperial provinces of a different type appear, in which the emperor, regarded as sovereign proprietor, governs by a viceroy (praefectus) or steward (procurator). In some of these, tributary kings or princes ruled with the emperor's representative—a legatus or a procurator—by their side, much as England now rules Egypt. Among the provinces so ruled were Egypt and Judaea, partly, no doubt, because of their strategic position, partly because of the temper of their inhabitants. William Arthur Heidel

GOZAN, gō′zan (גּוֹזָן, gōzān; Γωζάν, Gōẓán, B, Gōzár in 2 K 17 6, Chōzár in 1 Ch 5 26): A place in Assyria to which Israelites were deported on the fall of Samaria (2 K 17 6; 18 11; 1 Ch 5 26). It is also mentioned in a letter of Sennacherib to Hezekiah (2 K 19 12; Isa 37 12). The district is that named Guzana by the Assyrians, and Gauzanitis by Ptolemy, W. of Nisibis, with which, in the Assyr geographical list (WAI, II, 53, l. 43), it is mentioned as the name of a city (âlu Guzana; âlu Nasibina). It became an Assyr province, and rebelled in 759 BC, but was again reduced to subjection. See Habor; Halah. James Orr in the Gr text something over 170t (the reading is uncertain in places). In secular Gr of all periods it is also a very common word, and in both Bib. and secular Gr it is used with far more meanings than can be represented by any one term in Eng. Primarily (a) the word seems to denote pleasant external appearance, "gracefulness," "loveliness"; cf the personification in "the Graces." Such a use is found in Lk 4 22, where 'wondered at the charm of his words' is a good tr; and similarly in Col 4 6. (b) Objectively, charis may denote the impression produced by "gracefulness," as in 3 Jn ver 4 'greater gratification have I none than this' (but many MSS read chará, "joy," here). (c) As a mental attribute charis may be tr^{d} by "graciousness," or, when directed toward a particular person or persons, by "favor." So in Lk 2 52, "Jesus advanced . . . . in favor with God and men." (d) As the complement to this, charis denotes the emotion awakened in the recipient of such favor, i.e. "gratitude." So Lk 17 9 reads lit. 'Has he gratitude to that servant?' In a slightly transferred sense charis designates the words or emotion in which gratitude is expressed, and so becomes "thanks" (some 10t, Rom 6 17, etc). (e) Concretely, charis may mean the act by which graciousness is expressed, as in 1 Cor 16 3, where AV translates by "liberality," and RV by "bounty." These various meanings naturally tend to blend into each other, and in certain cases it is difficult to fix the precise meaning that the writer meant the word to convey, a confusion that is common to both NT and secular Gr. And in secular Gr the word has a still larger variety of meanings that scarcely concern the theologian.

GRABA, grā′ba. See Aggaba.

1. The Word Cháris

2. Grace as Power

Naturally, the various meanings of the word were simply taken over from ordinary language by the NT writers. And so it is quite illegitimate to try to construct on the basis of all the occurrences of the word a single doctrine that will account for all the various usages. That one word could express both "charm of speech" and "thankfulness for blessings" was doubtless felt to be a mere accident, if it was thought of at all. But, none the less, the very elasticity of the word enabled it to receive still another—new and technically Christian—meaning. This seems to have originated in part by fusing together two of the ordinary significances. In the first place, as in (e) above, charis may mean "a gift." In 1 Cor 16 3; 2 Cor 8 19 it is the money given by the Corinthians to the Jerusalemites. In 2 Cor 9 8 it is the increase of worldly goods that God grants for charitable purposes. In 2 Cor 1 15 it is the benefit received by the Corinthians from a visit by St. Paul. In a more spiritual sense charis is the endowment for an office in the church (Eph 4 7), more particularly for the apostolate (Rom 1 5; 12 3; 15 15; 1 Cor 3 10; Eph 3 2.7). So in 1 Cor 1 4–7 m charis is expanded into "word and all knowledge," endowments with which the Corinthians were esp. favored. In 1 Pet 1 13 charis is the future heavenly blessedness that Christians are to receive; in 3 7 it is the present gift of "life." In the second place, charis is the word for God's favor, a sense of the term that is esp. refined by St. Paul (see below). But God's favor differs from man's in that it cannot be conceived of as inactive. A favorable "thought" of God's about a man involves of necessity the reception of some blessing by that man, and "to look with favor" is one of the commonest Bib. paraphrases for "bestow a blessing." Between "God's favor" and "God's favors" there exists a relation of active power, and as charis denoted both the favor and the favors, it was the natural word for the power that connected them. This use is very clear in 1 Cor 15 10, where St. Paul says, "not I, but the grace of God which was with me" labored more abundantly than they all: grace is something that labors. So in 2 Cor 12 9, "My grace is sufficient for thee: for my power is made perfect in weakness"; cf 2 Tim 2 1, "strengthened in the grace," and 1 Pet 4 10, "stewards of the manifold grace." Evidently in this sense "grace" is almost a synonym for the Spirit (see Holy Spirit), and there is little real difference between "full of the Holy Spirit" and "full of grace and power" in Acts 6 5.8, while there is a very striking ∥ between Eph 4 7–13 and 1 Cor 12 4–11, with "gifts of grace" in the one passage and "gifts of the Spirit" in the other. And this connection between grace and the Spirit is found definitely in the formula "Spirit of grace" in He 10 29 (cf Zec 12 10). And, as is well known, it is from this sense of the word that the Catholic doctrine of grace developed.

3. Grace in Justification

This meaning of charis was obtained by expanding and combining other meanings. By the opposite process of narrowly restricting one of the meanings of the word, it came again into Christian theology as a technical term, but this time in a sense quite distinct from that just discussed. The formation of this special sense seems to have been the work of St. Paul. When charis is used with the meaning "favor," nothing at all is implied as to whether or not the favor is deserved. So, for instance, in the NT, when in Lk 2 52 it is said that "Jesus advanced . . . . in favor with God and men," the last possible thought is that Our Lord did not deserve this favor. Cf also Lk 2 40 and Acts 2 47 and, as less clear cases, Lk 1 30; Acts 7 46; He 4 16; 12 15.28. But the word has abundant use in secular Gr in the sense of unmerited favor, and St. Paul seized on this meaning of the word to express a fundamental characteristic of Christianity. The basic passage is Rom 11 5.6, where as a definition is given, "If it is by grace, it is no more of works: otherwise grace is no more grace." That the word is used in other senses could have caused no 1st-cent. reader to miss the meaning, which, indeed, is unmistakable. "Grace" in this sense is an attitude on God's part that proceeds entirely from within Himself, and that is conditioned in no way by anything in the objects of His favor. So in Rom 4 4. If salvation is given on the basis of what a man has done, then salvation is given by God as the payment of a debt. But when faith is reckoned for what it is not, i.e. righteousness, there is no claim on man's part, and he receives as a pure gift something that he has not earned. (It is quite true that faith involves moral effort, and so may be thought of as a sort of a "work"; it is quite true that faith does something as a preparation for receiving God's further gifts. But it simply clouds the exegetical issue to bring in these ideas here, as they certainly were not present in St. Paul's mind when the verses were being written.) "Grace," then, in this sense is the antinomy to "works" or to "law"; it has a special relation to the guilt of sin (Rom 5 20; 6 1), and has almost exactly the same sense as "mercy." Indeed, "grace" here differs from "mercy" chiefly in connoting eager love as the source of the act. See JUSTIFICATION. Of course it is this sense of grace that dominates Rom 3–6, esp. in the thesis 3 24, while the same use is found in Gal 2 21; Eph 2 5.8; 2 Tim 1 9. The same strict sense underlies Gal 1 6 and is found, less sharply formulated, in Tit 3 5–7. (Gal 5 4 is perhaps different.) Outside of St. Paul's writings, his definition of the word seems to be adopted in Jn 1 17; Acts 15 11; He 13 9, while a perversion of this definition in the direction of antinomianism is the subject of the invective in Jude ver 4. And, of course, it is from the word in this technical Pauline sense that an elaborate Protestant doctrine of grace has been developed.

4. Special Uses

A few special uses of the word may be noted. That the special blessing of God on a particular undertaking (Acts 14 26; 15 40) should be called a "grace" needs no explanation. In Lk 6 32–34, and 1 Pet 2 19.20, charis seems to be used in the sense of "that which deserves the thanks of God," i.e. a specifically Christian act as distinguished from an act of "natural morality." "Grace for grace" in Jn 1 16 is a difficult phrase, but an almost exact ‖ in Philo (Poster. Cain, 43) may fix the sense as "benefit on benefit." But the tendency of the NT writers is to combine the various meanings the word can have, something that is particularly well illustrated in 2 Cor 8, 9. In these two chapters the word occurs 10 t, but in so many different senses as to suggest that St. Paul is consciously playing with the term. Charis is the money given to the Jerusalemites by the Corinthians (8 19), it is the increase of goods that God will grant the Corinthians (9 8), it is the disposition of the givers (8 6), it is the power of God that has wrought this disposition (8 1; 9 14), it is the act of Christ in the Incarnation (8 9; contrast the distinction between "God's grace" and "Christ's act" in He 2 9), it is the thanks that St. Paul renders (2 Cor 9 15). That all a Christian is and all that he has is God's gift could have been stated of course without the use of any special term at all. But in these two chapters St. Paul has taught this truth by using for the various ideas always the same term and by referring this term to God at the beginning and the end of the section. That is, to the multiplicity of concepts there is given a unity of terminology, corresponding to the unity given the multiple aspects of life by the thought of entire dependence on God. So charis, "grace," becomes almost an equivalent for "Christianity," viewed as the religion of dependence on God through Christ. As one may think of entering Christianity, abiding in it, or falling from it, so one may speak of entering into (Rom 5 2), abiding in (Acts 13 43), or falling from (Gal 5 4) grace; cf 1 Pet 5 12. So the teaching of Christianity may be summed up as the word or gospel of grace (Acts 14 3; 20 24.32). So "grace be with you" closes the Epistles as a sufficient summary of all the blessings that can be wished Christian readers. At the beginning of the Epistles the words "and peace" are usually added, but this is due only to the influence of the Jewish greeting "peace be with you" (Lk 10 5, etc), and not to any reflection on "grace" and "peace" as separate things. (It is possible that the Gr use of chairein, "rejoice," as an epistolary salutation [so in Jas 1 1] influenced the Christian use of charis. But that "grace and peace" was consciously regarded as a universalistic combination of Jewish and gentile custom is altogether unlikely.) The further expansion of the introductory formula by the introduction of "mercy" in 1 and 2 Tim is quite without theological significance.

5. Teaching of Christ

In the Gr Gospels, charis is used in the words of Christ only in Lk 6 32–34; 17 9. As Christ spoke in Aram., the choice of this word is due to St. Luke, probably under the influence of its common Christian use in his own day. And there is no word in Our Lord's recorded sayings that suggests that He employed habitually any especial term to denote grace in any of its senses. But the ideas are unambiguously present. That the pardon of sins is a free act on God's part may be described as an essential in Christ's teaching, and the lesson is taught in all manner of ways. The prodigal knowing only his own wretchedness (Lk 15 20), the publican without merit to urge (Lk 18 13), the sick who need a physician (Mk 2 17), they who hunger and thirst after righteousness (Mt 5 6), these are the ones for whom God's pardon is inexhaustible. And positive blessings, be they temporal or spiritual, are to be looked for from God, with perfect trust in Him who clothes the lilies and knows how to give good gifts to His children (Mt 7 11; here Lk 11 13 has "Holy Spirit" for "gifts," doubtless a Lukan interpretation, but certainly a correct one). Indeed, it is not too much to say that Christ knows but one unpardonable sin, the sin of spiritual self-satisfaction—"That which is exalted among men is an abomination in the sight of God" (Lk 16 15; cf Lk 17 7–10; Mt 20 1–16).

6. In the OT

There is no word in Heb that can represent all the meanings of charis, and in the LXX charis itself is used, practically, only as a tr of the Heb ḥēn (חֵן), "favor," this restriction of meaning being due to the desire to represent the same Heb word by the same Gr word as far as possible. And ḥēn, in turn, is used chiefly only in the phrase "find favor" (Gen 6 8, etc), whether the reference is to God or men, and without theological importance. Much nearer St. Paul's use of charis is rāçōn (רָצוֹן), "acceptance," in such passages as Isa 60 10, "In my favor have I had mercy on thee"; Ps 44 3, "not . . . . by their own sword . . . . but . . . . because thou wast favorable unto them." Perhaps still closer parallels can be detected in the use of ḥeṣedh (חֶסֶד), "kindness," "mercy," as in Ex 20 6, etc. But, of course, a limitation of the sources for the doctrine to passages containing only certain words would be altogether unjust. The main lines seem to be these: (1) Technically, salvation by grace in the NT is opposed to an OT doctrine of salvation by works (Rom 4 4; 11 6), or, what is the same thing, by law (Rom 6 14; Jn 1 17); i.e. men and God are thought of as parties to a contract, to be fulfilled by each independently. Most of the legislation seems to presuppose some idea of man as a quantity quite outside of God, while Dt 30 11–14 states explicitly that the law is not too hard nor too far off for man. (2) Yet even this legalism is not without important modifications. The keeping of the law is man's work, but that man has the law to keep is something for which God only is to be thanked. Ps 119 is the essence of legalism, but the writer feels overwhelmed throughout by the greatness of the mercy that disclosed such statutes to men. After all, the initial (and vital!) act is God's not man's. This is stated most sharply in Ezk 23 1–4—Oholibah and her sister became God's, not because of any virtue in them, but in spite of most revolting conduct. Cf Dt 7 7, etc. (3) But even in the most legalistic passages, an absolute literal keeping of the law is never (not even in such a passage as Nu 15 30.31) made a condition of salvation. The thought of transgression is at all times tempered with the thought of God's pardon. The whole sacrificial system, in so far as it is expiatory, rests on God's gracious acceptance of something in place of legal obedience, while the passages that offer God's mercy without demanding even a sacrifice (Isa 1 18; Mic 7 18–20, etc) are countless. Indeed, in Ezk 16, 20, 23, mercy is promised to a nation that is spoken of as hardly even desiring it, a most extreme instance. (4) But a mere negative granting of pardon is a most deficient definition of the OT idea of God's mercy, which delights in conferring positive benefits. The gift to Abraham of the land of Canaan, liberation from Egypt, food in the wilderness, salvation from enemies, deliverance from exile—all of Israel's history can be felt to be the record of what God did for His people through no duty or compulsion, grateful thanksgiving for such unmerited blessings filling, for instance, much of the Psalter. The hearts of men are in God's keeping, to receive from Him the impulse toward what is right (1 Ch 29 18, etc). And the promise is made that the God who has manifested Himself as a forgiving Father will in due time take hold of His children to work in them actual righteousness (Isa 1 26; 4 3.4; 32 1–8; 33 24; Jer 31 33.34; Ezk 36 25.26; Zec 8; Dnl 9 24; Ps 51 10–12) With this promise—for the OT always a matter of the future—the OT teaching passes into that of the NT.

7. Summary

Most of the discussions of the Bib. doctrine of grace have been faulty in narrowing the meaning of "grace" to some special sense, and then endeavoring to force this special sense on all the Bib. passages. For instance, Roman Catholic scholars, starting with the meaning of the word in (say) 2 Cor 12 9, have made Rom 3 24 state that men are justified by the infusion of Divine holiness into them, an interpretation that utterly ruins St. Paul's argument. On the other hand, Protestant extremists have tried to reverse the process and have argued that grace cannot mean anything except favor as an attitude, with results that are equally disastrous from the exegetical standpoint. And a confusion has resulted that has prevented men from seeing that most of the controversies about grace are at cross-purposes. A rigid definition is hardly possible, but still a single conception is actually present in almost every case where "grace" is found—the conception that all a Christian has or is, is centered exclusively in God and Christ, and depends utterly on God through Christ. The kingdom of heaven is reserved for those who become as little children, for those who look to their Father in loving confidence for every benefit, whether it be for the pardon so freely given, or for the strength that comes from Him who works in them both to will and to do.

Literature.—All the Bib. theologies contain full discussions of the subject; for the NT the closest definitions are given by Bernard Weiss. But for the meaning of "grace" in any particular place the commentaries must be consulted, although the student may be warned against discussions that argue too closely from what may seem to be ‖ passages.

GRACIOUS, grā′shus (חָנַן, ḥānan; χάρις, cháris): In general, the word means "to favor," "to show kindness" to an inferior and "to be compassionate." All OT passages are derived from the same root, and yet there are two evident shades of meaning derived from it. (1) As above, "favorable" or, causative, "to cause to be g.," as "Jeh make his face to shine upon thee, and be g. unto thee" (Nu 6 25); "And the Lord was g. unto them" (2 K 13 23 AV); "The Lord is g. and full of compassion" (Ps 145 8 AV). (2) In a modified sense, "graceful," "winsome" or "attractive," as applied particularly to persons and things. Used thus 3t in the OT and once in the NT. "A g. woman retaineth honor" (Prov 11 16 AV; cf Eccl 10 12 and Lk 4 22).

The word is used once in the NT from root of Gr word χρηστός, chrēstós, meaning "useful" as a benefit: "if ye have tasted that the Lord is g." (1 Pet 2 3).

In the main, however, the adj. is applied in the OT to Jeh, as indicative of His favor and mercy, His long-suffering and general inclination of favor and kindness.

GRAFT, graft (ἐγκεντρίζω, egkentrízo; RV GRAFT; AV Graff): The word occurs 6 t in Rom 11. Paul assumed that those living about Rome were familiar with the process of grafting olive trees, for olive culture had been adopted by the Greeks and Romans in Paul's time. The wild olive trees (Arab. colloquial, zeitûn berri) are cut back, slits made on the freshly sawed branch ends, and two or three grafts from a cultivated olive (Arab. colloquial, zeitûn jouwi) are inserted in such a way that the bark of the scion and of the branch coincide. The exposed ends are smeared with mud made from clay, and then bound with cloth or date straw, which is held by thongs made from the bark of young mulberry branches. The fruit thus obtained is good. Wild olives cannot be made cultivated olives by ingrafting, as Paul implies (ver 24), but a wild olive branch thus grafted would thrive. So Gentiles would flourish spiritually when grafted into the fulness of God's mercy, first revealed to the world through Israel. James A. Patch

GRAIN, grān. See Agriculture; Garner.

GRANARY, gran'a-ri. See Garner; Storehouses.

GRAPES, grāps. See Vine.

GRAPES, WILD (בְּאֻשִׁים, be'ushīm, Isa 5 2.4): A word closely allied to בָּאְשָׁה, bo'shāh, Job 31 40, trd "cockle" (which see). It implies something noisome or worthless, but no particular fruit.

GRASP, grasp: The word ἁρπαγμός, harpagmós (Phil 2 6), is rendered by AV "robbery," by RV "a prize," and by ARV "a thing to be grasped." By derivation the term may denote either an act of seizing or the aim or result of the action. In the context Paul is discussing, not Christ's opinion of His equality with God, but His amazing self-sacrifice in laying aside His equality for our sakes. He treated it not as a treasure to be held for Himself, but laid it aside for us. It is better to render with RV "a prize."

GRASS, gras:

(1) חָצִיר, ḥāçīr, from a root meaning "greenness"; cf Arab. Khudra, which includes grasses and green vegetables (1 K 18 5; 2 K 19 26; Job 40 15; Ps 104 14, etc). Isa 15 6 is trd in AV "hay," RV "grass"; Prov 27 25, EV "hay," m "Heb grass"; Nu 11 5 EV translates "leeks." It is a term for herbage in general.

(2) דֶּשֶׁא, deshe', from root meaning "to sprout abundantly." Generally trd "tender grass" (Gen 1 11 f; 2 S 23 4; Job 6 5; Isa 15 6; 66 14; Jer 14 5, etc); trd "grass" (Job 6 5; Jer 14 5); trd "herb" (2 K 19 26; Ps 27 2; Isa 37 27; 66 14). In Jer 50 11 we have "heifer at grass" (deshe') in AV and RVm, but in RV "heifer that treadeth out the grain." דִּתְאָ, dethe', the Aram. form, occurs in Dnl 4 15.23, and is trd "tender grass."

(3) חֲשַׁשׁ, ḥăshash, probably "dry" or "cut grass"; cf Arab. حَشِيش, ḥashesh, "dry fodder" or "cut grass" (Isa 5 24, AV "chaff," RV "dry grass"; 33 11, EV "chaff").

(4) לֶקֶשׁ, leḳesh, from root meaning "to come late," hence used in Am 7 1 for the "latter growth" of grass after mowing.

(5) יֶרֶק, yereḳ, lit. "green thing" (Nu 22 4, elsewhere trd "herb").

(6) עֵשֶׂב, 'ēsebh (Dt 11 15, etc), generally trd "herb" (for [5] and [6] see Herb).

(7) χόρτος, chórtos (Mt 6 30; 14 19; Mk 6 39; Lk 12 28; Jn 6 10; Jas 1 10.11; 1 Pet 1 24; Rev 8 7; 9 4); trd "blade" (Mt 13 26; Mk 4 28); trd "hay" (1 Cor 3 12).

There are 243 species of true grasses (N.O. Gramineae) in Pal, but Heb, like modern Arab., does not discriminate between these and other herbs which together make up herbage. Actual turf is practically unknown in Pal, and grass seed is not artificially sown; young green barley is used in the neighborhood of towns as fresh fodder for horses and cattle. It is not the native custom to cut herbage for hay, though the writer has seen many carloads of sweet-smelling hay being carried from the land by Circassian settlers, E. of the Jordan.

The "grass upon the house tops" (Ps 129 6; Isa 37 27), the growth which springs from the seeds mingled with the mud of which the roof is made, springs up quickly with the rains, but as quickly dries up before it reaches half its normal height—or not infrequently is set on fire.

Dew, rain or showers upon the grass are mentioned (Dt 32 6; Prov 19 12; Mic 5 7; Ps 72 6, "rain upon the mown grass," i.e. the grass eaten short by cattle). E. W. G. Masterman

GRASSHOPPER, gras'hop-ẽr. See Locust.

GRATE, grāt, GRATING, grāt'ing (מִכְבָּר, mikhbār, רֶשֶׁת, resheth; AV Grate): This "grating of network of brass" (Ex 27 4; 38 4), called also "the net" (27 4 f), and "grating of brass" (38 4), was that reticulated casting or wrought work of bronze which, in the tabernacle system, formed an element of the altar of sacrifice. Its position is well defined: "Thou shalt put it under the ledge round the altar beneath, that the net may reach halfway up the altar" (27 5; cf 38 4). The altar being a hollow box—"hollow with planks" (27 8)—3 cubits high, overlaid with brass, and presumably filled with stones, there appears to have been a ledge round about it halfway from the base, from which depended vertically this grating of bronze. On the grating were four rings through which the staves were passed by which the altar was borne (27 4.7). If the ledge was for the priests to stand on while handling the sacrifices on the altar, the grating need be thought of only as an ornamental support for the ledge. Others ascribe to it different uses. W. Shaw Caldecott

GRAVE, grāv. See Burial.

GRAVE (adj.). See Gravity.

GRAVE, GRAVING, grāv'ing. See Crafts; Engraving.

GRAVEL, grav'el (חָצָץ, ḥāçāç, from root חָצַץ, ḥāçaç, "to divide." Kindred roots have the meaning of "to cut," "to hew," "to sharpen," hence חֵץ, ḥēç, "arrow" [2 K 13 17; Ps 64 7 and often]; cf Arab. حَصَّ, ḥaṣṣa, "to fall to the lot of," حِصَّة, ḥiṣṣah, "portion"): In Prov 20 17, we have:

> "Bread of falsehood is sweet to a man;
> But afterwards his mouth shall be filled with gravel."

And in Lam 3 16:

> "He hath also broken my teeth with gravel stones; he hath covered me with ashes."

The only other occurrence of the word is in Ps 77 17, where it is the equivalent of ḥēç, "arrow" (see supra):

> "The clouds poured out water;
> The skies sent out a sound:
> Thine arrows also went abroad."

Prov 20 17 and Lam 3 16 both suggest the frequent occurrence of grit in the coarse bread, the source of the grit being not necessarily the grindstone, but possibly even small stones originally mingled with the wheat and never properly separated from it. Alfred Ely Day

GRAVITY, grav'i-ti (σεμνότης, semnótēs): The word, meaning properly "venerableness," "sanctity," is used in 2 Macc 3 12 of the "sanctity" of the temple. In 1 Tim 3 4 the writer declares that a characteristic of a bishop should be that he has "his children in subjection with all g." Titus is enjoined (2 7 f) in his "doctrine" (teaching) to show "uncorruptness, g., sound speech [RV], that cannot be condemned" (cf 1 Tim 3 8). In 1 Tim 2 2 the same word is tr^d "honesty" (RV "gravity"), "that we may lead a tranquil and quiet life in all godliness and g." A better rendering of semnotēs might be "dignity" or "dignified seriousness" (Olshausen), which quality is necessary, both on the part of parents in relation to their children, if they are to be properly trained, and on the part of preachers and teachers, if their "doctrine" is to be worthily represented. All mere lightness of demeanor (the opposite of gravity) tells against the great trusts committed to both parents and teachers (cf 1 Tim 3 11; Tit 2 2). Such "gravity" or "dignified seriousness" ought indeed to characterize Christian demeanor in general, as in 1 Tim 2 2 above. W. L. WALKER

GRAY, grā. See COLORS; HOARY.

GREASE, grēs (חֵלֶב, ḥēlebh, "fat," "suet"): The word occurs once in the metaphorical sense "prosperous," then dull, gross, brutal: "Their heart is as fat as grease" (Ps 119 70; cf Isa 6 10, and see FAT).

GREAT, grāt, GREATNESS, grāt′nes: "Great" occurs very often in Scripture. The chief words so tr^d are גָּדוֹל gādhōl, רַב, rabh; μέγας, mégas, πολύς, polús.

(1) In the OT many other terms are employed: (a) gādhōl is used to express greatness in various senses, chiefly of magnitude, including excellence, e.g. "great lights" (Gen 1 16); "the great city" (10 12); "a great nation" (12 2); "a great sight" (Ex 3 3); "Moses was very great" (11 3); "the great God" (Dt 10 17; Neh 1 5); "great is Jeh" (Ps 48 1). It is sometimes tr^d by "mighty" (Dt 4 37; 7 21, "a mighty God," RV "great"). It is also used to designate the high priest (lit. "great," Lev 21 10; Zec 3 1, etc); also to express the "elder" of a family, e.g. Gen 27 1, "Esau his eldest son," RV "elder"; probably also of great stature: "a great man among the Anakims," RV "the greatest" (Josh 14 15). (b) rabh denotes, rather, quantity, number, therefore, often, "many" (Gen 21 34, etc; Ex 2 23 RV, etc); "abundant" (Ex 34 6, ERV "plenteous"), and similar terms; thus we have "a great people" (Josh 17 14); "His mercies are great," RVm "many" (2 S 24 14; 1 Ch 21 13); "Great was the company," RV "a great host" (Ps 68 11); "great reward" (Ps 19 11); "Mine iniquity . . . . is great" (25 11); "exceedingly" (Ps 123 3). In the LXX rabh is, for the most part, tr^d by polus. But it is used for "great" in other senses, e.g. "the great [God]" (Prov 26 10), RV "as an archer," m "master worker; Heb text obscure"; "a saviour, and a great one," RV "defender," m "or a mighty one" (Isa 19 20); "Great shall be the peace" (Isa 54 13), etc. It is sometimes tr^d "mighty" (Ps 89 50, RVm "many"; Isa 63 1). (c) Other words thus tr^d are kābhēdh, "heavy," e.g. "so great a people," RV "thy great people," m "heavy" (1 K 3 9); m^{e}'ōdh, implying force, might, e.g. "with all his might" (2 K 23 25). 'Ēl and 'Ĕlōhīm are sometimes used to express greatness. In Ps 36 6, we have "Thy righteousness is like the great ['El] mountains," RV "mountains of God"; in Gen 30 8, "with great ['Ĕlōhīm] wrestlings," RV "mighty," m "wrestlings of God"; and in 1 S 14 15 "a very great ['Ĕlōhīm] trembling," RV "exceeding great," m "a trembling of God."

(2) (a) Megas denotes magnitude, in its various aspects, physical, moral, etc, e.g. "great joy" (Mt 2 10); "a great light" (4 16); "the great King" (5 35); "great in the kingdom" (5 19, etc); "Great is thy faith" (15 28); "The greatest is charity" (love), RVm "greater" (1 Cor 13 13); "a great high priest" (He 4 14); "the great shepherd" (13 20); "a great voice" (Rev 1 10); in Rev megas is very frequent. (b) Polus denotes properly number, multitude, e.g. "great multitudes" (Mt 4 25); "a great company" (Lk 5 29, RV "a great multitude"; frequent in the Gospels); "great possessions" (Mk 10 22). But also "great" in the sense of magnitude, e.g. "great plainness of speech," RV "boldness" (2 Cor 3 12; 7 4); "a great trial of affliction," RV "much proof" (8 2); "great love" (Eph 2 4). (c) Among other terms we have tēlikoútos, "so great" (in degree), "so great a salvation" (He 2 3); tosoútos, "so great" (in quantity), "so great faith" (Mt 8 10; Lk 7 9); "so great a cloud of witnesses" (He 12 1); hósos, "how great" (in quantity) (Mk 3 8; 5 19 f); hēlíkos, "how great" (in degree) (Col 2 1; Jas 3 5, "how great a matter," RV "how much wood," m "how great a forest"); pēlíkos, "how great" (in degree) (He 7 4); pósos, "how great" (in quantity) (Mt 6 23), etc.

(3) In His person and teaching, Jesus introduced into the world a new conception of greatness. It was to be found in humility and self-forgetting service: "Whosoever would become great among you shall be your minister [RVm "servant"]; and whosoever would be first among you shall be your servant [RVm "Gr bond-servant"]: even as the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many" (Mt 20 26–28; cf also Mt 18 1–4; 23 11; Phil 2 5–11). W. L. WALKER

GREAVES, grēvz. See ARMOR, ARMS, IV, 4.

GRECIANS, grē′shanz, GREEKS, grēks: In the OT the word "Grecians" occurs but once (Joel 3 [4] 6). For references to Greece in the OT see JAVAN. In AV of the OT Apoc "Grecians" and "Greeks" are used without distinction, e.g. 1 Macc 1 10; 6 2; 8 9; 2 Macc 4 15.36. Thus in 1 Macc 1 1, Alexander the Great is spoken of as king of Greece, and in 1 Macc 1 10 the Macedonian empire is called "the kingdom of the Greeks" (βασιλεία Ἑλλήνων, basileía Hellḗnōn). In 2 Macc 13 2 the army of Antiochus, king of Syria, is called "Grecian" (δύναμις Ἑλληνική, dúnamis Hellēnikḗ), and in 2 Macc 6 8 the "Greek cities" (πόλεις Ἑλληνίδες, póleis Hellēnídes) are Macedonian colonies. Reference is made in 2 Macc 6 1 to an aged Athenian who was sent by Antiochus the king charged with the duty of Hellenizing the Jews; in 2 Macc 9 15 Antiochus vows that he will make the Jews equal to the Athenians; in 1 Macc 12–14 reference is made to negotiations of Jonathan, the high priest, with the Spartans, whom he calls brethren, seeking the renewal of a treaty of alliance and amity against the Syrians. With the spread of Gr power and influence, everything not specifically Jewish was called Gr; thus in 2 Macc 4 36; 11 2; 3 Macc 3 3.8 the "Greeks" contrasted with the Jews are simply non-Jews, so called because of the prevalence of Gr institutions and culture, and "Greek" even came to be used in the sense of "anti-Jewish" (2 Macc 4 10.15; 6 9; 11 24).

In Isa 9 12 the LXX reads τοὺς Ἕλληνας, toús Héllēnas, for פְּלִשְׁתִּים (p^{e}lishtīm), "Philistines"; but we are not therefore justified in assuming a racial connection between the Philis and the Greeks. Further light on the ethnography of the Mediterranean basin may in time show that there was actually such a connection; but the rendering in question proves nothing, since "the oppressing sword" of Jer 46 16 and 50 16 is likewise rendered in the LXX with "the sword of the Greeks" (μάχαιρα Ἑλληνική, máchaira Hellēnikḗ). In all these cases the translators were influenced by the conditions existing in their own day, and were certainly not disclosing obscure relations long forgotten and newly discovered.

In the NT, EV attempts to distinguish between Ἕλληνες (Héllēnes), which is rendered "Greeks," and Ἑλληνισταί (Hellēnistaí), which is rendered "Grecians" or "Grecian Jews," or in RVm "Hellenists," e.g. Acts 6 1; 9 29. These latter were Jews of the Dispersion, who spoke Greek (see HELLENISM; HELLENIST), as distinguished from Palestinian Jews; but since many of the latter also spoke Gr by preference, the distinction could in no sense be absolute. Indeed in Jn 7 35, "the Dispersion among [RVm "Gr of"] the Greeks," can hardly refer to any but "Grecian Jews" (Hellēnistai), although Hellēnes is used, and in Jn 12 20 the "Greeks" (Hellēnes) who went up to worship at the feast of the Passover were almost certainly "Grecian Jews" (Hellēnistai). Thus, while EV consistently renders Hellēnes with "Greeks," we are not by that rendering apprised of the real character of the people so designated. This difficulty is aggravated by the fact, already noted in connection with the OT Apoc, that, in consequence of the spread of Hellenism, the term Hellēnes was applied not only to such as were of Hellenic descent, but also to all those who had appropriated the language of Greece, as the universal means of communication, and the ideals and customs collectively known as Hellenism. The latter were thus in the strict sense Hellenists, differing from the "Grecians" of EV only in that they were not of Jewish descent. In other words, Hellēnes (except perhaps in Jn 7 35 and 12 20, as noted above) is, in general, equivalent to tá éthnē, "Gentiles" (see GENTILES). The various readings of the MSS (and hence the difference between AV and RV) in 1 Cor 1 23 well illustrate this. There is consequently much confusion, which it is quite impossible, with our limited knowledge of the facts in particular cases, to clear up. In general, it would seem probable that where "Greeks" are comprehensively contrasted with "Jews," the reference is to "Gentiles," as in Acts 14 1; 17 4; 18 4; 19 10.17; 20 21; Rom 1 16; 10 12; 1 Cor 1 22–24 (RV "Gentiles," representing ἔθνεσιν, éthnesin); Gal 3 28; Col 3 11. In Mk 7 26 the woman of Tyre, called "a Greek [RVm "Gentile"], a Syrophoenician," was clearly not of Hellenic descent. Whether Titus (Gal 2 3) and the father of Timothy (Acts 16 1.3) were in the strict sense "Greeks," we have no means of knowing. In Rom 1 14, "I am debtor both to Greeks and to Barbarians," there is an undoubted reference to Greeks strictly so called; possibly, though by no means certainly, the "Greeks" of Acts 21 28, alluding to Trophimus the Ephesian (Acts 21 29), are to be taken in the same sense. References to the Gr language occur in Jn 19 20 (Lk 23 38 is properly omitted in RV); Acts 21 37; Rev 9 11.

In Acts 11 20 the MSS vary between Ἑλληνιστάς, Hellēnistás, and Ἕλληνας, Héllēnas (AV "Grecians," RV "Greeks"), with the preponderance of authority in favor of the former; but even if one adopts the latter, it is not clear whether true Greeks or Gentiles are intended. WILLIAM ARTHUR HEIDEL

GREECE, grēs, GRAECIA, grē′sha: In the earliest times there was no single name universally and exclusively in use either of the people or of the land of Greece. In Homer, three appellations, Ἀχαιοί (Achaioí), Δαναοί (Danaoí), Ἀργεῖοι (Argeíoi), were with no apparent discrimination applied to all the Greeks.

1. Name

By the Orientals they were called Ionians. See JAVAN. The name Ἕλληνες (Héllēnes), which in historical times came into general use as a collective appellation, was applied in Homer to a small tribe in Thessaly. But the corresponding name Ἑλλάς (Hellás) was not primarily a geographical term, but designated the abode of the Hellenes wherever they had their own states or cities. In the 4th cent. BC many felt, as did Isocrates, that even "Hellene" stood not so much for a distinction in race, as for preëminence of culture, in contrast to the despised "Barbarian." Hence there was much dispute as touching certain peoples, as, e.g. the Epirotes, Macedonians, and even the Thessalians, whether they should be accounted Hellenes and as included in Hellas. The word Γραικοί (Graikoí, Lat Graeci) occurs in Aristotle, who says that it was an older name for those who were later called Hellenes. The meaning and truth of this statement are alike in doubt; but he probably refers only to the tribe inhabiting the vicinity of Dodona, in Epirus. At any rate, Graeci and Graecia owed their introduction practically to the Romans after their contact with the Greeks in the war with Pyrrhus, and in consequence they included (what "Hellenes" and "Hellas" did not) Epirus and Macedonia.

2. Location and Area

"Hellas," as the land of the Hellenes, is used in a broad sense to include not only Greece proper, but also the islands of the Ionian and Aegean seas, the seaboard of the Hellespont, of the Pontus, and of Asia Minor, the flourishing colonial regions of Magna Graecia and Sicily, Crete, and occasionally Cyprus, Cyrene, and the scattered colonies dotting the shore of the Mediterranean, almost to the Pillars of Hercules. "Graecia," however, was used in a more restricted sense as applying to "Continuous" (or continental) Greece, which forms the southern extremity of the Balkan peninsula. While the Romans included Macedonia and Epirus, it will be well for us to limit Greece to the territory lying roughly below 40°, and extending almost to 36° N. lat., and ranging between 17° and 23° E. long. If, as is proper, we include the immediately adjacent islands, its greatest length, from Mt. Olympus in the N. to Cythera in the S., is about 280 miles; its greatest breadth, from Cephallenia in the W. to Euboea in the E., is about 240 miles. The area, however, owing to the great irregularity of its contour, is far less than one might expect, amounting to about 30,000 sq. miles. With an area, therefore, considerably less than that of Portugal, Greece has a coastline exceeding in length that of Spain and Portugal combined. In Greece the ratio of coastline to area is 1: 3¼, whereas that of the Iberian peninsula is 1: 25.

3. Mountain Structure

The northern boundary of Greece is formed by an irregular series of mountain chains, beginning on the W. with the Acroceraunian range and ending in Mt. Olympus (now, Elymbos, 9,790 ft.) on the E. Intersecting this line, the lofty Pindus range, forming the backbone of Northern Greece, extends southward to Mt. Tymphrestus (now, Velouchi, 7, 610 ft.) in Aetolia, at which point spurs radiate through Central Greece. The highest peaks are Mt. Corax (now, Vardusia, 8,180 ft.) in Aetolia, Mt. Oeta (7,060 ft.), Parnassus (now, Lyakoura, 8,070 ft.), Helicon (now, Paléo Vouno, 5,740 ft.), Cithaeron (now, Elatias, 4,630 ft.), lying on the boundary between Boeotia and Attica, Mt. Geranea (now, Makri Plaghi, 4,500 ft.), N. of the Isthmus, and, in Attica, Parnes (now, Ozea, 4,640 ft.), Pentelicon (now, Mendeli, 3,640 ft.) and Hymettus (now, Trelovouni, 3,370 ft.). Along the eastern coast extends a broken range of mountains, the highest peaks of which are Ossa (now, Kissavos, 6,400 ft.), Pelion (now, Plessidi, 5,310 ft.); and, in Euboea, which virtually belongs to this range, Dirphys (now, Delphi, 5,730 ft.) and Ocha (now, St. Elias, 4,610 ft.). Southern Greece, or the Peloponnesus, is united to Central Greece only by a narrow isthmus (now cut by a canal 4 miles long), with a minimum altitude of about 250 ft. In the northern portion, a confused mass of mountains rises to great heights in Cyllene (now, Ziria, 7,790 ft.), Erymanthus (now, Olonos, 7,300 ft), Maenalus (now, Apano Chrepa, 6,500 ft.), all in Arcadia, Panachaïcus (now, Voïdia, 6,320 ft.), in Achaea; and, running southward through Laconia, the two important ranges called Taÿgetus (now, Pentedaktylo, 7,900 ft.) and Parnon (now, Malevo, 6,430 ft.). Minor ranges jut seaward in Argolis, Laconia and Messenia.

4. Rivers and Lakes

The rainfall in Greece is not abundant and is confined largely to late autumn and winter. Whether the present rainfall differs much in amount from that of antiquity is a matter in dispute, although it seems reasonable to assume that the progressive denudation of the mountains since the 5th cent. AD has entailed a corresponding loss in humidity. Even in antiquity, however, the rivers of Greece were much like the arroyos of the S.W. portion of the U.S.A., which are in winter raging mountain torrents, and in summer dry channels. Owing to the proximity of the sea to all points in Greece, the rivers are short, and the scarcity of springs makes them dependent upon the direct and immediate rainfall. Among the more considerable rivers may be enumerated, in Northern Greece, the Peneius, with its tributaries, in Thessaly; Central Greece, the Achelous and the Evenus, in Aetolia; the Spercheius, flowing between Oeta and Othrys into the Maliac Gulf; the storied, but actually insignificant, Ilyssus and Cephissus, of the Attic plain; in Southern Greece, the Alpheius, rising in Arcadia and flowing westward through Elis, and the Eurotas, which drains Laconia. Eastern Greece consists of a series of somewhat considerable basins, which become lakes in winter and are pestilent marshes in summer, except where Nature or man has afforded an outlet. The former is the case with the Peneius, which has cut a channel through the celebrated Vale of Tempe. Lake Copais, in Boeotia, affords an example of man's activity. The Minyae, in prehistoric times, are credited with enlarging the natural outlets, and so draining the basin for a time; in recent times the same undertaking has again been brought to a successful issue. Similar basins occur at Lake Boebeis, in Thessaly, and at Lake Stymphalus, in Arcadia, besides others of less importance. Western Greece has relatively few such basins, as at Lake Pambotis, in Epirus, and at Lake Trichonis, in Aetolia. In many cases, where there is no surface outlet to these basins, subterranean channels (called by the Greeks Katavothrae) are formed in the calcareous rock, through which the waters are drained and occasionally again brought to the surface at a lower level.

5. Climate

The climate of Greece was probably much the same in ancient times as it is today, except that it may have been more salubrious when the land was more thickly populated and better cultivated. Herodotus says that of all countries, Greece possessed the most happily tempered seasons; and Hippocrates and Aristotle commend it for the absence of extremes of heat and cold, as favorable for intelligence and energy. But owing to the inequalities of its surface, to the height of its mountains and the depth of its valleys, the climate varies greatly in different districts. In the highlands of the interior the winter is often cold and severe, the snow lying on the ground until late in the spring, while in the lowlands near the sea there is rarely any severe weather, and snow is almost unknown. The following data for Athens may be taken as a basis for comparison: humidity 41 per cent, rainfall 13.2 in., distributed over 100 days; mean temperature, Jan. 48.2° F., July 80.6° F. Greece lies open to the northern winds which, during certain seasons, prevail and give a bracing quality to the air not always present in places of the same latitude.

6. Geology

The western half of Greece, in which the mountain ranges run generally from N. to S., consists of a formation of greyish and yellowish-white compact limestone, while the eastern half—Macedonia, Thessaly, Euboea, Cyllene, and the mountains from Artemision to Cape Malea and Taÿgetus—together with the greater part of Attica and of the Cyclades, consists of mica-schist and crystalline-granular limestone (marble). Tertiary formations occur in narrow strips on the N. and N.W. slopes of the ranges in the Peloponnesus and in the valley of the Eurotas, in Boeotia and Euboea. Volcanic action is evidenced both in the parallel elevations of similar or contemporary formation, and in the earthquakes frequent in all ages, esp. in Southern and Central Greece, and in the islands of the Aegean. Perennially active volcanoes are nowhere found in Greece, but new formations due to volcanic action are most clearly seen on the island of Thera among the Cyclades, where they have occurred within the last half-century. The solfatara between Megara and Corinth, and the abundant hot springs at widely scattered points in Greece also bear witness to the volcanic character of the region. Many an ancient site, venerated for its sanctity in antiquity, like those of Delphi and Olympia, in their ruined temples offer mute testimony to the violence of the earthquakes; and history records repeated instances of cities engulfed by tidal waves of appalling height.

7. Topography

Mention has already been made of the sinuous coastline of Greece, and the land has been spoken of as consisting of three divisions. Northern Greece, to which Epirus and Thessaly belong, is marked off from Central Greece by the deep indentations of the Ambracian Gulf on the W. and the Maliac Gulf on the E. The Pegasaean Gulf, virtually continued by Lake Boebeis, reaches far into Thessaly, and divides it from Magnesia, which lies to the eastward. The land of the Dolopians really belongs to Northern Greece. Central Greece consists of Acarnania and Aetolia on the W., and of Phocis, Boeotia and Attica (with the adjacent island of Euboea) on the E., separated by a group of lesser states, Aenis, Oetaea, Doris, Locris and Phocis. Southern Greece is separated from Central Greece by the Corinthian and Saronic Gulfs, which almost meet at the Isthmus of Corinth, and are now, after repeated efforts, dating from the time of Julius Caesar, united by a sea-level canal. Megaris, which, by its position, belongs to Central Greece, is here, in accordance with its political affinities and predilections, classed with Corinth, the keeper of the isthmus, as belonging to Southern Greece. Facing the Corinthian Gulf, Achaea forms the northern division of the Peloponnesus, touching Elis, Arcadia and Argolis, which belt the peninsula in this order from W. to E. Arcadia is the only political division which does not have access to the sea, occupying as it does the great central plateau intersected by lesser ranges of varying height. The southernmost divisions, Messenia and Laconia, are deeply indented by the Messeniac and Laconic Gulfs, and Laconia is separated from the peninsula of Argolis by the Argolic Gulf, all of which head somewhat W. of N. Of the subjacent islands, which a reasonable view must include in the boundaries of Greece, Euboea has already been mentioned; but we should add the group of great islands lying in the Ionian Sea, viz. Corcyra (now, Corfu), Leukas, Ithaca, Cephallenia (now, Cephalonia), Zacynthus (now, Zante), and Cythera (now, Cerigo), at the mouth of the Laconic Gulf, as well as Salamis and Aegina in the Saronic Gulf.

Greece was never, in ancient times, a united state, but consisted of a large number of separate states. These were essentially of two types, (a) city-states, in which a city dominated the adjacent territory whose free population constituted its citizenship, or (b) confederacies, in which neighboring cities or districts combined into political organizations which we may call federal states. These matters cannot, however, be discussed except in connection with the history of Greece, for which the reader must consult the standard works. It may be advisable here, however, to name the principal cities of Greece. Northern Greece had no great cities which developed as commercial centers. Aegina was the first to attain to special importance, then Corinth and Athens; Chalcis and Eretria, in Euboea, were for a time rich and prosperous, and Megara, in Megarid, and Argos, in Argolis, became formidable rivals of Athens. Sparta, though never a commercial center, early won and long maintained the hegemony of Greece, for a while disputed by Athens, in virtue of her power as the home of the militant Dorian aristocracy, which was disastrously defeated by the Boeotians under Epaminondas, when Thebes, for a time, assumed great importance. Megalopolis, in Arcadia, enjoyed a brief prominence at the time of the Achaean League, and Corcyra flourished in the 5th and 4th cents. BC. We should also not fail to mention three great centers of Gr religion: Olympia, in Elis, as the chief sanctuary of Zeus; Delphi, in Phocis, as the oracular seat of Apollo; and Eleusis, in Attica, as the pilgrim-shrine to which all Greeks resorted who would be initiated in the mysteries of Demeter and Cora. Argos also possessed a far-famed shrine of Hera, and Thermopylae and Calauria were the centers at which met the councils of influential amphictyonies. Epidaurus was famous for her sanctuary of Asclepius. Delos, a little island in mid-Aegean, celebrated as a sanctuary of Apollo and as the meeting-place of a most influential amphictyony, falls without the limits of Greece proper; but Dodona, in Southern Epirus, should be mentioned as the most ancient and venerable abode of the oracle of Zeus. The Greeks, incorrigibly particularistic in politics, because of the almost insuperable barriers erected by Nature between neighboring peoples in the lofty mountain ranges, were in a measure united by their religion which, like the sea, another element making for intercourse and union, touched them at nearly every point.

For Greece in the OT, see JAVAN. In the NT "Greece" occurs but once—Acts 20 2—where it is distinguished from Macedonia.

LITERATURE

I. The Greek Gods.—The gods of ancient Greece are well known to our western civilization through the myths which have found so large a place in our literature. In Greece itself, fancy had free play in dealing with these divine beings, and the myths were the main treasure-house from which the poet drew; the same myths and the same gods, under different names, reappear in Rome; and Rome passed them on, a splendid heritage of imagination, to the literatures of later Europe. It is characteristic of myths that they deal with persons, not so different from men in their nature, but with more than human powers. Gods, nymphs and satyrs, noble "heroes" or evil spirits have superhuman powers in varying degree, but they remain persons with a human interest because of their human type. And, further, as men are organized in families, cities and states, so there is a tendency to organize the beings of myth into social groups, and even to bring men, heroes and gods together into one large social organism, the universe of persons.

1. Greek Myths

Coin of Elis—Zeus of Pheidias.

These Gr myths, the story of Athena's birth full-armed from the brain of Zeus, of Circe's magic potion, of Poseidon's chariot on the waves, and of Apollo's shafts are familiar to us from childhood. To regard them as expressing the content of Gr religion is as natural as it is false. Very few myths have any religious meaning at all, in spite of the large part the gods play in them. A little comparison with the facts of worship serves to show that here the gods are quite different from the gods of story. Some of the gods hardly appear in myths, and some of the beings of myth are not worshipped; in worship, each god is for the time being the only god thought of, not a member of the hierarchy established in myth; moreover in myth the gods are treated as universal, while the gods of worship are most closely attached, each to one shrine. Along with these external differences goes the one essential difference between a being of story and an object of worship. The failure to recognize the deep meaning of Gr religion results from the superficial assumption that myths constitute a peculiar kind of theology, when in reality they teach but little, and that, indirectly, about religion proper.

2. Mythology Distinguished from Religion

3. Local Shrines

The essential fact about the gods of Gr religion is that each god was worshipped in a unique form at one or another particular shrine by a group of worshippers more or less definite. The group might include the state, the dwellers in one locality or simply the family; whatever its limits, it included those connected with the god by a social-religious tie, and the fundamental purpose of the worship was to strengthen this tie. In a city like Athens there were hundreds of such shrines, varying in importance, each the place where one particular phase of a god was worshipped at specified times. The particular form of the god was ordinarily indicated by an epithet attached to his name, Zeus Olympios, Dionysus Eleutherios, Athena Nike. This epithet might refer to the locality of the worship (Aphrodite of the Gardens), to the center from which the worship was brought (Artemis Brauronia), to some local spirit identified with the greater god (Poseidon Erechtheus), or to the nature of the god himself (Apollo Patroos).

4. Epithets of the Gods

Each of the many shrines in Athens had thus its unique god, its group of worshippers connected with the god, its particular form of worship and times of worship, its own officials. While the state exercised general supervision over all the shrines, they were not organized in a hierarchy under any distinctly religious officials, but remained as independent units. Religious worship in a given city meant the aggregation of independent worships at the different local shrines.

5. Nature of the Gods of Worship

The god of worship, then, was the god of a local shrine whose blessing and favor were sought at certain times by those who had the right to worship there. As in myth the gods were drawn after human types, that is, with human virtues and human frailties, and bodies almost human, except that they were not made to die; so in worship the gods were persons not unlike men in their nature. Worship proceeds on the assumption that gods are like human rulers, in that men honor the gods by games and processions, seek to please them by gifts, and ask them to share banquets made in their honor. Only the humanness of the gods in worship is something more subtle, more intimate than in myth. No stress is laid on human form or the vagaries of human character in the gods of worship; in form they remain spirits more or less vague, but spirits who care for men, who may be approached as a man approaches his ruler, spirits bound to man by close social ties which it is his duty and pleasure to strengthen. Zeus is father of gods and men, a father not untouched by the needs of his children; Athena cares for the city of Athens as her special pride; each family worships gods which are all but akin to the family; in the gymnasium, Apollo or Hermes is represented as the patron and ideal of the youths who exercise there; the drama is part of the service of Dionysus; in a word each form of human activity, be it work or pleasure, was a point of contact with the gods. The real forces at work in the world were first men, and secondly beings with a nature like man's, but with powers superior to man's; worship was the attempt to ally the gods more closely to man by social-religious ties, in order that as both worked together the ends of life might be successfully attained. This conception of the gods as higher members of society is the keynote of Gr religion. In some ethnic religions the gods seem to be evil beings whose desire for mischief man must overcome; in others they are beings to be avoided as much as possible; or again they are rulers who delight in man's abject servitude; or again by cultivating the friendship of one god, man may hope to win blessing and avoid harm from the others. In Greece all the gods of worship were essentially friendly to man, because they were akin to him and a part of the society in which he lived.

6. Relation of Greek Gods to Nature

The relation of the gods to Nature is not so simple as might at first appear. Within certain limits the forces of Nature were subject to the will of the gods. From the Gr point of view, however, the relation is much more intimate, in that the forces in the world, at least in so far as they affect man, are personal activities, activities that express the will of divine beings. We say that Poseidon personifies the sea, Gaia the earth, Helios the sun; and the origin of religion has been sought in man's awe before the forces of Nature. The truer statement is that the Gr world, including the physical world, was made up of spiritual beings, not of physical forces. "The fire, as useful as it is treacherous, is the province of Hephaestus; all the dangers and changeableness of the sea are reflected in Poseidon and his followers; an Artemis is there to guide the hunter, a Demeter to make the grain sprout, a Hermes or Apollo to watch over the herds; Athena is the spirit of wisdom, Hermes of shrewdness, Ares of tumultuous war. . . . . In a word the Gr gods are in the world, not above the world, superior beings who embody in personal form all the forces that enter into human life." The contrast between such a personal point of view and the mechanical view of modern science is as marked as the contrast between it and the Heb conception of a universe brought into being and controlled by a God quite distinct from the physical world.

7. The Greater Gods of Greece

Of the particular gods, little need be said. The five greater gods, Zeus, Hera, Athena, Apollo and Artemis, are not closely connected with any one phenomenon of Nature or human life, though Zeus has to do with the sky, and Apollo and Artemis acquire a connection with the sun and moon. The most important worship of Zeus was at Olympia, where the pan-Hellenic games were held in his honor. Elsewhere he was worshipped mainly in connection with the weather and the changing seasons. Apparently much of his preëminence in Gr thought was due to myth. Hera was worshipped with Zeus on mountain tops, but her special place in worship was as the goddess of marriage. Athena, the maiden goddess of war and of handicrafts, was worshipped esp. in Northern Greece. War dances found a place in her worship, and she was rarely represented without aegis, spear and helmet. All the arts, agriculture, handicrafts, even the art of government, were under her care. Apollo was worshipped widely as the protector of the crops, and of the shepherd's flocks. In this aspect his festivals included purifications and rites to ward off dangers. He was also the god of music and of prophecy. At Delphi his prophetic powers won great renown, but the Pythian games with their contests in music, in rhythmic dancing, and in athletic sports were hardly less important. Artemis, in myth the chaste sister of Apollo, was worshipped as the queen of wild creatures and the mother of life in plants as well as in animals. She was the patron and the ideal of young women, as was Apollo of young men.

8. Nature Gods

The gods most closely associated with Nature were not so important for religion. Gaia, mother earth, received sacrifices occasionally as the abode of the dead. Rhea in Crete, Cybele in Asia Minor, also in origin forms of the earth mother, received more real worship; this had to do primarily with the birth of vegetation in the spring, and again with its destruction by drought and heat. Rivers were honored in many places as gods of fertility, and springs as nymphs that blessed the land and those who cultivated it. Poseidon was worshipped that he might bless fishing and trade by sea; inland he was sometimes recognized as the "father of waters," and a god of fertility; and where horses were raised, it was under the patronage of Poseidon. The heavenly bodies marked the seasons of worship, but were rarely themselves worshipped. In general, the phenomena of Nature seem to have been too concrete to rouse sentiments of worship in Greece.

9. Gods of Human Activity and Emotions

A third class of gods, gods of human activities and emotions, were far more important for religion. Demeter, once no doubt a form of the original earth-goddess, was the goddess of the grain, worshipped widely and at many seasons by an agricultural people. Dionysus, god of souls, of the inner life, and of inspiration by divine power, was worshipped by all who cultivated the vine or drank wine. The Attic drama was the most important development of his worship. Hermes was quite generally honored as the god of shepherds and the god of roads. As the herald, and the god of trade and gain, he found a place in the cities. Aphrodite was perhaps first the goddess of the returning life of the spring; in Greece proper she was rather the goddess of human love, of marriage and the family, the special patron of women. Ares, the Thracian god of war, was occasionally worshipped in Greece, but more commonly the god of each state was worshipped to give success in battle to his people. Hephaestus, pictured as himself a lame blacksmith working at the art which was under his protection, was worshipped now as the fire, now as the patron of cunning work in metal. Asclepius received men's prayers for relief from disease.

II. Revelation: Inspiration.—For the Greeks revelation was a knowledge of the divine will in special circumstances, and inspiration was evinced by the power to foresee the divine purpose in a particular case. There is no such thing as the revelation of the divine nature, nor any question of universal truth coming to men through an inspired teacher; men knew a god through his acts, not through any seer or prophet. But some warning in danger or some clue to the right choice in perplexity might be expected from gods so close to human need as were the Gr gods. The Homeric poems depicted the gods as appearing to men to check them, to encourage them or to direct them. In Homer also men might be guided by signs; while in later times divine guidance came either from signs or from men who were so close to the gods as to foresee something of the divine purpose.

1. Omens

The simplest class of signs were those that occurred in Nature. In the Iliad the thunderbolt marked the presence of Zeus to favor his friends or check those whose advance he chose to stop. The Athenian assembly adjourned when rain began to fall. Portents in Nature—meteors, comets, eclipses, etc—claimed the attention of the superstitious; but there was no science of astrology, and superstition had no great hold on the Greeks. In the Homeric poems, birds frequently denoted the will of the gods, perhaps because their place was in the sky beyond any human control, perhaps because certain birds were associated with particular gods. The presence of an eagle on the right hand (toward the E.) was favorable, esp. when it came in answer to prayer. At times, the act of the bird is significant, as when the eagle of Zeus kills the geese eating grain in Odysseus' hall—portent of the death of the suitors. In later Gr history there are but few references to signs from birds. The theory of these signs in Nature is very simple: all Nature but expresses the will of the gods, and when the gods wish to give men some vague hint of the future, it is necessary only to cause some event not easily explained to attract man's attention.

2. Divination by Sacrifice

From the 5th cent. on, divination by means of sacrificial victims took the place ordinarily of signs such as have just been described. In the presence of the enemy or before some important undertaking, animals were sacrificed to the gods. If they came willingly to the altar, if the inward parts, esp. the liver, were sound and well shaped and of good color, if the sacrifice burned freely and without disturbing the arrangement on the altar, success might be expected. The theory was very simple: if the gods were pleased and accepted the sacrifice, their favor was assured; but if the sacrifice deviated in any way from the normal, it would not please the gods. Thus any sacrifice might have prophetic significance, while sacrifices offered before important undertakings had special meaning. The practice arose of repeating sacrifices before a battle until a favorable one was obtained, and at length, as religion began to lose its hold, the time came when a general might disregard them completely.

3. Dreams

An important means of learning the will of the gods was through dreams, when the ordinary channels of perception were closed and the mind was free to receive impressions from the gods. The treacherousness of dreams was fully recognized, even in the Homeric poem; students of natural science came to recognize that dreams arose from natural causes; none the less they were generally regarded as a source of knowledge about the future, and gradually a science for interpreting dreams was evolved. For Pindar and for Plato the soul was more free when the body slept, and because the soul was the divine part of man's nature it could exercise the power of divination in sleep. Many of the recorded dreams are signs which came to the mind in sleep, like the dreams of Joseph and of Pharaoh, signs that needed later interpretation. See Divination; Dreams.

Prophets and seers were not as important in Greece as among many peoples. The blind Teiresias belongs to the realm of myth, though there were great families of seers, like the Iamidae at Olympia, who were specially gifted to interpret dreams, or signs from sacrifices. Ordinarily it was the "chresmologist," the man with a collection of ancient sayings to be applied to present events, whose advice was sought in time of need; or else men turned to the great oracles of Greece.

4. Oracles

The most important oracle was that of Apollo at Delphi. Hither came envoys of nations as well as individuals, and none went away without some answer to their questions. After preliminary sacrifices, the priestess purified herself and mounted the tripod in the temple; the question was propounded to her by a temple official, and it was his function also to put her wild ravings into hexameter verse for the person consulting the oracle. A considerable number of these answers remain to us, all, of course, somewhat vague, many of them containing shrewd advice on the question that was brought to the oracle. The honor paid to the oracle and its influence, on the whole an influence making for high ethical standards and wise statesmanship, must be recognized. The early Christian Fathers held that the Pythian priestess was inspired by an evil spirit; later critics have treated the whole institution as a clever device to deceive the people; but in view of the respect paid to the oracle through so many generations, it is hard to believe that its officials were not honest in their effort to discover and make known the will of the god they served.

Plan of the Precincts of Apollo's Temple at Delphi.

1. Shrines

III. Forms of Worship.—It has already been pointed out that Gr religion centered about local shrines. While in early times the shrine consisted of an altar with perhaps a sacred grove, and later it might be no more than a block of stone on which offerings were laid, the more important shrines consisted of a plot of land sacred to the god, a temple or home for the god, and an altar for sacrifices. The plot of land, esp. in the case of shrines outside a city, might be very large, in which case it often was used as a source of income to the shrine, being cultivated by the priests or leased under restrictions to private persons.

2. Temples

In this precinct stood the temple, facing toward the E., so that the morning sun would flood its interior when it was opened on a festival day. With one or two exceptions, the temple was not a place of assembly for worship, but a home for the god. It contained some symbol of his presence, after the 5th cent. BC ordinarily an image of the god; it served as the treasure-house for gifts brought to the god; worship might be offered in it by the priests, while the people gathered at the sacrifice outside. And as a home for the god, it was adorned with all the beauty and magnificence that could be commanded. The images of the gods, the noblest creation of sculpture in the 5th and 4th cents., were not exactly "idols"; that is, the images were not themselves worshipped, even though they were thought to embody the god in some semblance to his true form. In Greece men worshipped the gods themselves, grateful as they were to artists who showed them in what beautiful form to think of their deities.

3. Priests

Each of these shrines was directly in the hands of one or more officials, whose duty it was to care for the shrine and to keep up its worship in due form. Occasionally the priesthood was hereditary and the office was held for life; quite as often priests were chosen for a year or a term of years; but it was exceptional when the duties of the office prevented a man from engaging in other occupations. In distinction from the priests of many other forms of religion, the Gr priest was not a sacred man set apart for the service of the gods; the office may be called sacred, but the office was distinct from the man. The result was important, in that the priests in Greece could never form a caste by themselves, nor could they claim any other powers than were conferred on them by the ritual of the shrine. Thus Gr religion remained in the possession of the people, and developed no esoteric side either in dogma or in worship.

4. Seasons of Worship: Festivals

The seasons of worship varied with each particular shrine. While the state observed no recurring sabbath, it recognized a certain number of religious festivals as public holidays; thus at Athens the number of religious holidays in the year was somewhat larger than our fifty-two Sundays. The tradition of each shrine determined whether worship should be offered daily or monthly or yearly, and also what were the more important seasons of worship. The principle of the sacred days was that at certain seasons the god was present in his temple expecting worship; just as it was the principle of sacred places that the temple should be located where the presence of the god had been felt and therefore might be expected again. Neither the location of the temple nor the seasons of worship were determined primarily by human convenience.

Two braids of hair hang in a niche below the inscription "Philombrotus, Apthonetus, (sons) of Deinomachus, (to) Poseidon."

5. Elements of Worship

The elements of worship in Greece were (1) prayers, hymns, and votive offerings, (2) the sacrificial meal, (3) propitiatory sacrifice and purification, and (4) the processions, musical contests and athletic games, which formed part of the larger festivals. The heroes of Homer prayed to the gods at all times, now a word of prayer in danger, now more formal prayers in connection with a sacrifice; and such was doubtless the practice in later times.

6. Prayer

In the more formal prayers, it was customary to invoke the god with various epithets, to state the petition, and to give the reason why a favorable answer might be expected—either former worship by the petitioner, or vows of future gifts, or former answers to prayer, or an appeal to the pity of the god. Sometimes a prayer reads as if it were an attempt to win divine favor by gifts; more commonly, if not always, the appeal is to a relationship between man and his god, in which man's gifts play a very subordinate part. Thanksgiving finds small place in prayer or in sacrifice, but it was rather expressed in votive offerings. In every temple these abounded, as in certain Roman Catholic shrines today; and as is the case today they might be of value in themselves, they might have some special reference to the god, or they might refer to the human need in which the giver had found help. So far as the great public festivals are concerned, the prayer seems to have been merged with the hymn of praise in which the element of petition found a small place.

7. Burnt Offering or Sacrificial Meal

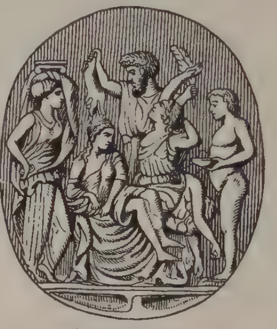
The most common form of worship consisted of the sacrificial meal, like the meat offering or meal offering of the Hebrews. The sacrifice consisted of a domestic animal, selected in accordance with the ritual of the shrine where it was to be offered. First the animal was led to the altar, consecrated with special rites and killed by the offerer or the priest while hymns and cries of worship were uttered by the worshippers. Then some of the inward parts were roasted and eaten by priests and worshippers. Finally the remainder of the creature was prepared, the thigh bones wrapped in fat and meat to be burned for the god, the balance of the meat to be roasted for the worshippers; and with libations of wine the whole was consumed. The religious meaning of the act is evidently found in the analogy of a meal prepared for an honored guest.

8. Meaning of the Sacrifice

The animal, an object valuable in itself, is devoted to this religious service; the god and his worshippers share alike this common meal; and the god is attached to his worshippers by a closer social bond, because they show their desire to honor and commune with him, while he condescends to accept the gift and to share the meal they have prepared. (Possibly the animal was once thought to have been made divine by the act of consecration, or the god was believed to be present in his flesh, but there is no evidence that such a belief existed in the 5th cent. BC, or later.) The simple, rational character of this worship is characteristic of Gr religion.

9. Propitiatory Sacrifice

When men felt that the gods were displeased or in circumstances where for any reason their favor was doubtful, a different form of sacrifice was performed. A black animal was selected, and brought to a low altar of earth; the sacrifice was offered toward evening or at night, and the whole animal was consumed by fire. While in general this type of sacrifice may be called propitiatory, its form, if not its meaning, varied greatly. It might be worship to spirits of the earth whose anger was to be feared; it might be offered when an army was going into battle, or when the crops were in danger of blight, or of drought; or again it was the normal form of worship in seasons of pestilence or other trouble. Sometimes the emphasis seems to be laid on the propitiation of anger by an animal wholly devoted to the god, while at other times there is the suggestion that some evil substance is removed by the rite.



Purification.

10. Purification

The later conception is clearer in rites of purification, where, by washing, by fire, or by the blood of an animal slain for the purpose, some form of defilement is removed. In the sacrifice of a pig to Demeter for this purpose, or of a dog to Hecate, some mystic element may exist, since these animals were sacred to the respective goddesses.

These various elements of worship were combined in varying degree in the great religious festivals. These lasted from a day to a fortnight. After purification of the worshippers, which might be simple or elaborate, and some preliminary sacrifice, there was often a splendid procession followed by a great public sacrifice.

11. The Great Religious Festivals

In the greater festivals, this was followed by athletic games and horse races in honor of the god, and sometimes by contests in music and choral dancing, or, in the festivals of Dionysus at Athens, by the performance of tragedy and comedy in the theater. In all this, the religious element seems to retreat into the background, though analogies may be found in the history of Christianity. The religious mystery plays were the origin of our own drama; and as for the horse races, one may still see them performed as a religious function, for example, at Siena. The horse races and the athletic games were performed for the gods as for some visiting potentate, a means of affording them pleasure and doing them honor. The theatrical performances apparently originated in ceremonies more essentially religious, in which men acted some divine drama depicting the experiences attributed to the gods themselves.

12. Mysteries at Eleusis

This last feature is most evident in the mysteries at Eleusis, where the experiences of Demeter and Persephone were enacted by the people with the purpose of bringing the worshippers into some more intimate connection with these goddesses, such that their blessing was assured not only for this world, but for the life after death.

13. Absence of Magic and Mystery

In all the forms of Gr worship perhaps the most striking feature was the absence of magic or superstition, almost the absence of mystery. Men approached the gods as they would approach superior men, bringing them petitions and gifts, making great banquets for their entertainment, and performing races and games for their pleasure, although this was by no means the whole of Gr religion, a phase of religion far more highly developed in the rational atmosphere of Gr thought than among other races. As the Gr gods were superior members of the social universe, so Gr worship was for the most part social, even human, in its character.

IV. The Future Life.—Gr thought of the life after death was made up of three elements which developed successively, while the earlier ones never quite lost their hold on the people in the presence of the later.

1. Funeral Rites

The oldest and most permanent thought of the future found its expression in the worship of ancestors. Whether the body of the dead was buried or burned, the spirit was believed to survive, an unsubstantial shadowy being in the likeness of the living man. And rites were performed for these shades to lay them to rest and to prevent them from injuring their survivors, if not to secure their positive blessing. As at other points in Gr religion, the rites are fairly well known, while the belief must be inferred from the rites. The rites consisted first of an elaborate funeral, including sometimes animal sacrifices and even athletic games, and secondly of gifts recurring at stated intervals, gifts of water for bathing, of wine and food, and of wreaths and flowers. The human wants and satisfaction of the spirit are thus indicated. And the purpose is perhaps to keep the spirit alive, certainly to keep it in good humor so that it will not injure the survivors and bring on them defilement which would mean the wrath of the gods. At the same time, any contact with death demands purification before one can approach the gods in worship.

2. Future Life in the Homeric Poems

The second element in Gr thought of the future life appears in the Homeric poems, and through the epic exerted a wide influence on later periods. Here the separateness of the souls of the dead from the human life is emphasized. Once the bodies of the dead are burned, the souls go to the realm of Hades, whence there is no return even in dreams, and where (according to one view) not even consciousness remains to them. It would seem that the highly rational view of the world in the epic, a point of view which laid stress on the greater Olympian gods, banished the belief in souls as akin to the belief in sinister and magic influences. We might almost say that the thought of the greater gods as personal rulers tended to drive out the thought of lesser and more mystic spiritual influences, and made a place for souls only as shades in the realm of Hades. Certainly the result for Gr religion was to render far less vivid any idea of a real life after death.

3. Later Beliefs in Immortality

The third element was associated with the worship of the gods of the lower world, and in particular Demeter and Persephone. In this worship, particularly at Eleusis, the fact of life after death was assumed, a fact that the Greeks never had denied; but the reality of the future life, the persistence of human relationship after death, and the kindly rule of Persephone as Queen of Souls were vividly impressed on the worshippers. In part through the influence of the Orphic sect, the actual divinity of the soul was believed by many thinkers, a doctrine which was formulated by Plato in a manner which profoundly affected early Christian thought. If the epic emphasis on the greater gods made the souls mere shades in Hades, it was again a religious movement, namely the worship of gods like Persephone and Dionysus, which taught to some Greeks the divine reality of the soul and its hope for a blessed life in communion with the gods.

This development in Greece is the more interesting because there are indications of the same thing in Heb history. In the OT there are found traces of an old worship of souls, practised by races akin to the Hebrews if not by the Hebrews themselves; this worship was brought to an end under the clarifying power of the worship of Jeh; and finally the later prophets perceived the truth that while souls were not to be worshipped, the dead who died in the Lord did not become mere shades, but continued to live as the objects of His Divine love.

V. Sin, Expiation, and the Religious Life.—

1. Greek Idea of Sin

The ancient Heb religion made much of sin, and of the remedy for sin which God, in loving mercy to His people, had provided; in Greece the thought of sin found no such place in the religious life, though of course it was not absent altogether. If sin is defined as that which causes divine displeasure and wrath, it appears in Gr thought in three forms: (1) as the transgression of moral law, (2) as neglect of the gods and consequent presumption, and (3) as pollution. The cause of sin is traced to human folly, either some passion like envy or anger or desire for gain, or to undue self-reliance which develops into presumption; and once a man has started in the wrong direction, his sin so affects judgment and will that he is all but inevitably led on into further sin. According to the simple Gr theodicy, the transgression of moral law brings its penalty, nor can any sacrifice induce the gods to intervene on behalf of the transgressor. All that expiation can accomplish is to set right the spirit of the transgressor so that he will not be led into further sin. Neglect of the gods—the second type of sin—brings its penalty in the results of divine wrath, but in this case, prompt repentance and submission to the gods may appease the wrath and therefore change its results. Pollution, the third cause of divine displeasure, often cannot be called sin; the failure to remove pollution, however, esp. before one approaches the gods, is a just cause of divine anger. In general the Gr thought of sin centers about the idea of undue self-reliance and presumption, ὕβρις (húbris), which is the opposite of the characteristic Gr virtue, σωφροσύνη (sōphrosúnē), namely that temperate mode of life in which everything is viewed in right proportion. Inasmuch as the Gr gods are righteous rulers, the nature of sin lies in its opposition to divine justice, not in unholiness or in the rejection of divine love.

2. Religious Ideals

The demands of the religious life in Greece were relatively simple. To avoid acts of impiety such as are mentioned above, to perform the ordinary acts of worship regularly and punctiliously, were all that was required, though the religious man might find many opportunities for worship beyond what was expected of everyone. Little is said of the spirit of worship which underlay the outward acts. Nor does the command, "Be ye therefore holy, even as I am holy," find an echo in Greece. At the same time the fact that the gods so definitely represented human ideals of life, must have meant that in a way men aimed to make their lives conform to divine ideals. The essential feature of the religious life was the true recognition of human dependence on the gods, a dependence which showed itself in obedience to the divine rule, in trustful confidence that the gods would bless their worshippers, in resignation when misfortune came, and particularly in the belief in the loving care and protection of the divine rulers. In Greece, the religious man looked to the gods not so much for salvation from evil, as for positive blessings.

VI. The Influence of Greek Religion on Christianity.—

1. Greek Philosophy and Christian Theology

This is not the place to speak of the decadence of Gr religion, of its ameliorating influence on the Alexandrian world, or of the control it exercised over the Rom state. Its most permanent effect is found rather in Christianity. And here its shaping influence is first noted in Christian theology beginning with Paul and the Apostle John. For although Gr religion was more free from dogma or anything that could be called theology than are most religions, it furnished the religious content to the greatest philosophical systems we know; and all through the centuries the leaders of Christian thought have been trained in the religious philosophy of Plato and of Aristotle. Our Christian conceptions of the nature of God and the soul, of the relation of God to the physical universe, and of God's government of the world, have been worked out along the lines laid down by these Gr thinkers. And while the debt is primarily to Gr philosophy, it should never be forgotten that Gr philosophy formulated these conceptions out of the material which Gr religion furnished; indeed one may believe that it was the religious conceptions formulated by centuries of thoughtful worshippers which found final expression in the Gr philosophic systems.

2. Greek Influence on Christian Liturgy

Again, the organization of the early Christian church and its form of government was quite as much Gr as it was Heb in origin. Here the influence of Gr religion as such was less marked; still it must be remembered that every form of Gr organization had its religious side, be it family, or school, or state; and further, that some phases of religion in Greece were quite thoroughly organized in a manner that was adapted without much difficulty to the conditions of the new religion. Moreover the thought of the Gr priest as not a sacred man, but a man appointed by the community to a sacred office, was naturally adopted by the nascent Christian communities. Even in the organization of worship, in the prayers and hymns and liturgy which gradually developed from the simplest beginnings, it is not difficult to trace the influence of what the Gr converts to Christianity had been brought up to regard as worship of the gods.

3. Greek Influence on the Sacraments

The most striking case of the effect of the old religion on the new is found in the method of celebrating the Christian sacraments. In the 2d cent. AD, the baptismal bath took place after a brief period of instruction, and at the common meal the bread and wine were blessed in commemoration of the Master. Three centuries passed and this simplicity had given way to splendid ceremony. Baptism ordinarily was performed only on the "mystic night," the night before Easter. Almost magic rites with fasting had exorcised evil from the candidate; ungirded, with loose hair and bare feet, he went down into the water, and later was anointed with oil to signify the gift of the Holy Spirit; then the candidates, dressed in white, wearing crowns, and carrying torches, proceeded to their first communion in which a mixture of honey and milk might take the place of wine. The whole ceremony had been assimilated to what Gr religion knew as an initiation, in which the baptized underwent some essential change of nature. They were said to have "put on the dress of immortality."

The Lord's Supper was carefully limited to those who had been through this initiation, and even among these, at length, degrees of privilege arose. The ceremony came to be known as a mystery, the table as an altar, the officiating priest as a "hierarch," and the result as a blessed "vision" of sacred things by which the resurrection life was imparted. In its formal character and the interpretation of its meaning, as well as in the terms used to describe it, the effect of the Gr mysteries may be seen.

Yet during these three centuries Christianity had been waging a life-and-death struggle with the old religion. It is indeed impossible to believe that converts to Christianity should intentionally copy the forms of a worship which they had often at much cost to themselves rejected as false. The process must have been slow and quite unconscious. As the language of heathen philosophy was used in forming a Christian theology, so the conceptions and practices which had developed in Gr religion found their way into the developing Christian ritual. Much of this ritual which had no essential place in Christianity was later rejected; some still remains, the contribution of the religious life of Greece to the forms of worship in our world religion.

ARTHUR FAIRBANKS

GREECE, SONS OF: "I will stir up thy sons, O Zion, against thy sons, O Greece, and will make thee as the sword of a mighty man" (Zec 9 13). The passage doubtless refers to the captive Hebrews who are held by the Greeks. The exhortation is to insurrection against the Greeks. Although bearing a striking similarity to the passage in Joel 3 6, there is evidently no connection between the two. In the first, there was conflict between the nations; in the second, simply a reflection upon Tyre and Sidon for having sold into Greece certain Jewish captives. From a Jewish standpoint the Maccabean wars were really between Jews and Greeks. See JAVAN; ASMONEANS.

GREETING, grēt′ing (שָׁאַל, shā'al; χαίρω, chaírō, ἀσπασμός, aspasmós, ἀσπάζομαι, aspázomai):

(1) Shā'al means "to ask," "to inquire of anyone respecting welfare," hence "to greet." In the OT the word "greet" occurs only once in AV or RV, viz. in 1 S 25 5, "Go to Nabal, and greet him in my name." But it is implied in other places where shālōm ("well," "prosperity," "peace"), the common Heb greeting, is used; e.g. in Gen 37 4, it is said of Joseph that "his brethren could not speak peaceably unto him," i.e. could not give him the common friendly greeting of "Peace!" "Peace be to thee!" So, in Gen 43 27, RV "He asked them of their welfare" (AVm "peace"); Ex 18 7, "They asked each other of their welfare" (AVm "peace"); 2 S 11 7, "how Joab did, and how the people did" (RV "fared," AVm "of the peace of"); Joab said to Amasa (2 S 20 9), RV "Is it well with thee, my brother?" (Heb "Art thou in peace, my brother?"); Boaz greeted his reapers with "Jeh be with you;" and they answered, "Jeh bless thee" (Ruth 2 4; cf Ps 129 8, "The blessing of Jeh be upon you; we bless you in the name of Jeh"). For the king, we have, AV and ERV, "God save the king" (m "Let the king live," ARV "[Long] live the king") (1 S 10 24, etc); "Let my lord king David live for ever" (1 K 1 31; see also Neh 2 3; Dnl 2 4, etc). In Ecclus 6 5 it is said "a fair-speaking tongue will increase kind greetings," RV "multiply courtesies" (euprosḗgora).

(2) When Jesus sent forth His disciples to proclaim the kingdom, they were to "salute" the house they came to (Mt 10 12), saying (Lk 10 5), "Peace [eirḗne] be to this house!"; if it was not worthy, the blessing should return to themselves. After His resurrection He greeted His disciples saying, "Peace be unto you" (Lk 24 36; Jn 20 19. 21.26); He left His "peace" with them as His parting blessing (Jn 14 27)—"not as the world giveth," in a formal way. A frequent form of greeting in the NT is chairō ("to rejoice," imp. and inf., chaire, chairete, "Joy to thee," "Joy to you," trᵈ "Hail!" and "All hail!" Mt 26 49; 27 29; 28 9; Mk 15 18; Lk 1 28; Jn 19 3), "Rejoice!" (Phil 3 1; ERVm "farewell"). Another word for greeting is aspasmos, "greetings in the markets" (AV Mt 23 7; Mk 12 38, "salutations"; Lk 11 43, "greetings," Lk 20 46; also Lk 1 29.41.44; 1 Cor 16 21; Col 4 18; 2 Thess 3 17; in all these places RV has "salutation").

(3) Of epistolary greetings we have examples in Ezr 4 17, "Peace" (shᵉlām), etc; 5 7; Dnl 4 1; 6 25. These are frequent in the Apoc: 1 Esd 6 7, "to King Darius greeting" (chairō); 8 9; 1 Macc 10 18, etc; 2 Macc 1 10, "greeting, health," etc. We have the same form in Acts 15 23; 23 26. In 3 Jn ver 14 it is, "Peace [be] unto thee. The friends salute thee." Paul opens most of his epistles with the special Christian greeting, "Grace to you and peace from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ" (Rom 1 7; 1 Cor 1 3, etc). Also at the close, "The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ be with you" (1 Cor 16 23; 2 Cor 13 14, etc). He directs greetings to be given to various persons, and sends greetings from those who are with him (Rom 16 5–23; 1 Cor 16 19 f; 2 Cor 13 13; Phil 4 21 f; Col 4 10, etc). In those cases the word is aspazomai, and RV trˢ "salute," etc (cf Jas 1 1; 1 Pet 1 2; 5 14; 2 Pet 1 2; 2 Jn vs 3.13; Jude ver 2). See GODSPEED; KISS.

GREYHOUND, grā′hound. See DOG.

GRIEF, grēf, GRIEVE, grēv: There are some 20 Heb words trᵈ in AV by "grief," "grieve," "to be grieved," etc. Among the chief are חָלָה, ḥālāh, חֳלִי, ḥŏlī, יָגוֹן, yāghōn, כַּעַס, ka'aṣ, עָצַב, 'āçabh. They differ, partly, in their physical origin, and partly, in the nature and cause of the feeling expressed. RV in several instances gives effect to this.

(1) Ḥālāh, ḥŏlī express the sense of weakness, sickness, pain (e.g. Samson, in Jgs 16 7.11.17, "Then shall I become weak [ḥālāh], and be as another man"); Isa 17 11 AV, "a heap in the day of grief"; 53 3.4, "a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief," "He hath borne our griefs" (ḥŏlī), RVm "Heb sickness, sicknesses"; ver 10, "He hath put him to grief," RVm "made him sick" (ḥālāh) (tr^{d} by Dillmann and others, "to crush him incurably"; cf Mic 6 13; Nah 3 19); yāghōn, perhaps from the pain and weariness of toil (Ps 31 10), "For my life is spent with grief," RV "sorrow"; "The Lord added grief to my sorrow," RV "sorrow to my pain" (Jer 45 3); ka'aş implies provocation, anger, irritation; thus Hannah said to Eli (AV), "Out of the abundance of my complaint and my grief [RV "provocation"] have I spoken" (1 S 1 16). Ps 6 7; 31 9, "grief"; Prov 17 25, "A foolish son is a grief to his father" (i.e. source of provocation; the same word is rendered "wrath" in 12 16, AV "a fool's wrath," RV "vexation"; so also 27 3); Job 6 2, "Oh that my grief were thoroughly weighed," RV "Oh that my vexation were but weighed" (in 5 2 AV the same word is tr^{d} "wrath," RV "vexation"); k^{e}'ēbh, is "sorrow," "pain," properly "to hurt." It occurs in Job 2 13, "His grief [RVm "or pain"] was very great"; also 16 6 RV, "grief"; makh'ōbh "sorrows," "pain," "suffering" (2 Ch 6 29, RV "sorrow"; Ps 69 26, RVm "or pain"; Isa 53 3, "a man of sorrows"; ver 4, "Surely he hath carried our sorrows"); mārāh and mārar indicate "bitterness" (Gen 26 35; 49 23; 1 S 30 6; Ruth 1 13; Prov 14 10, "The heart knoweth its own bitterness," mārāh); pūḳāh implies staggering, or stumbling, only in 1 S 25 31, "This shall be no grief unto thee," RVm "Heb cause of staggering"; ra' (a common word for "evil") denotes an evil, a calamity, only once in AV tr^{d} "grief," viz. of Jonah's gourd, "to deliver him from his grief," RV "from his evil case" (Jon 4 6); yāra', "to be evil," Dt 15 10, RV "Thy heart shall not be grieved when thou givest unto him" (also 1 S 1 8; Neh 2 10; 13 8; several times tr^{d} "grievous"); ḥārāh, "to burn," "to be wroth" (e.g. Gen 4 6, "Why art thou wroth?"), is tr^{d} "grieved" in Gen 45 5, and 1 S 15 11 AV (RV "Samuel was wroth"); the same word is often used of the kindling of anger; lā'āh, "to be weary," "tired," "faint" (Prov 26 15), AV "The slothful hideth his hand in his bosom, it grieveth him to bring it again to his mouth," RV "wearieth"; also Job 4 2; 'āçabh, "to grieve," "to be vexed," occurs in Gen 6 6; 34 7; 45 5, etc; Ps 78 40, "How oft did they . . . . grieve him in the desert." Of other words sometimes tr^{d} "grief" may be mentioned ḳūṭ, "to weary of," "to loathe" (Ps 95 10), "Forty long years was I grieved with that generation"; in 119 158; 139 21, RVm "loathe"; ḥāmēç, implying to be bitterly or violently moved, sour (often tr^{d} "leavened"), only in Ps 73 21, RV "For my soul was grieved," m "Heb was in a ferment."

(2) In the NT "grief," "grieve," etc, are infrequent. The commonest words are lúpē (1 Pet 2 19), RV "griefs," elsewhere tr^{d} "sorrow"; lupéō, "to grieve," "afflict" (Mk 10 22, RV "sorrowful"; Jn 21 17, "Peter was grieved"; Rom 14 15; 2 Cor 2 4, RV "made sorry"; ver 5, "caused sorrow"; Eph 4 30, "Grieve not the Holy Spirit of God"); diaponéomai, lit. "to labor through," "to grieve self," occurs twice (Acts 4 2; 16 18, RV "sore troubled"); stenázō, "to groan, or sigh," once only tr^{d} "grief" (He 13 17), RVm "groaning"; prosochthízō, "to be indignant," etc, twice (He 3 10.17, RV "displeased"). The reference is to Ps 95 10, where the LXX by this Gr word tr^{s} ḳūṭ (see above).

The less frequency in the NT of words denoting "grief" is significant. Christ came "to comfort all that mourn—to give a garland for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness." Christians, however, cannot but feel sorrow and be moved by grief, and it is to be noted that in both the OT and NT, God Himself is said to be susceptible to grief. W. L. Walker

GRIEVANCE, grēv'ans (עָמָל, 'āmāl): Occurs only in AV as a tr of Hab 1 3, "Why dost thou show me iniquity, and cause me to behold grievance?" (RV "look upon perverseness"); 'āmāl is also tr^{d} "perverseness" by AV and RV in Nu 23 21, "perverseness in Israel"; Isa 10 1, AV "grievousness," RV "perverseness." In Hab 1 13, AV tr^{s} the same word "iniquity" (m "grievance"), "Thou art of purer eyes than to behold evil and canst not look on iniquity" (m "grievance"), RV "perverseness." The word means originally "toil," "labor" with sorrow, misery, etc, as the consequence, and is often so tr^{d}. It is the word in Isa 53 11, "He shall see of the travail of his soul, and shall be satisfied." W. L. Walker

GRIEVOUS, grēv'us, GRIEVOUSLY, grēv'us-li, GRIEVOUSNESS, grēv'us-nes: In addition to several of the words mentioned under Grief (q.v.), we have kābhēdh ("heavy") 8 t, e.g. Gen 12 10, "The famine was grievous in the land," RV "sore"; māraç ("powerful"), "a grievous curse" (1 K 2 8); şūr, "to turn aside" (Jer 6 28), "grievous revolters"; ḳāsheh, "to make sharp" (1 K 12 4; 2 Ch 10 4); taḥălu'īm (Jer 16 4), "They shall die grievous deaths," RVm "deaths of sicknesses"; 'āthāḳ (Ps 31 18), "which speak grievous things proudly," RV "against the righteous insolently"; ḥēṭ, "sin" (Lam 1 8), "Jerus hath grievously sinned" (lit. "hath sinned a sin"); mā'al, "trespass" (Ezk 14 13), "trespassing grievously" (lit. "trespassing a trespass"), RV "committing a trespass"; kōbhedh, "weight" (Isa 21 15), "grievousness"; barús, "heavy," "grievous wolves" (Acts 20 29), "grievous charges" (25 7), "His commandments are not grievous" (1 Jn 5 3); oknērós, RV "irksome" (Phil 3 1); ponērós, "evil" (Rev 16 2), "a grievous sore"; dusbástaktos, "grievous to be borne" (Mt 23 4; Lk 11 46); deinós, "greatly," "grievously tormented" (Mt 8 6); kakōs, "badly," "grievously vexed" (Mt 15 22). GROAN, grōn (נָאַק, nā'aḳ, אָנַק, 'ānaḳ; στενάζω, stenázō, ἐμβριμάομαι, embrimáomai): The Eng. word, noun and vb., is an attempt to imitate the vocal sound which is expressive of severe pain or distress, physical or mental. It is cognate with the Scottish dialect word girn, and with grin in its original obsolete sense, as used in the Anglican Prayer-book version of Ps 59 6.14, "grin like a dog and go about the city"; here "grin" is a tr of hāmāh, and means the sound of the nightly howling of the pariah dogs in Jerus and other oriental cities. It is used in the OT:

(1) To denote the expression accompanying physical suffering, as in the case of the Israelites in Egypt oppressed by Pharaoh's taskmasters (Ex 2 24; 6 5), or in Pal under the yoke of the Canaanites (Jgs 2 18, n^{e}ḳāḳāh). It is also used in Job's description of the sufferings and wretchedness of the poor (24 12), as well as in his complaint concerning his own suffering when smitten by the hand of God (23 2). The Psalmist speaks of groaning when fever-stricken and remorseful, AV and RV "roaring all the day long" (Ps 32 3; 38 9; 102 5; 22 1).

(2) The expression of suffering on the part of beasts, hungry and thirsty in drought (Joel 1 18).

(3) The manifestation of mental and spiritual distress as in Ps 6 6; 102 20 (RV "sighing").

(4) Metaphorically groaning is the despairing note of Egypt in the prophecy of her overthrow by

Babylon, the sound being that uttered by a deadly wounded man (Ezk 30 24; similarly in the prophecy of the Pers conquest the misery of Babylon is thus represented by Jer 51 52); and the misery of Tyre when taken by Babylon is similarly described (Ezk 26 15, AV "cry").

The word for "sigh" ('ănāḥāh) is closely allied, and the meanings are sufficiently akin, so that the terms seem interchangeable. A sigh is physically a sign of respiratory distress due to depressed action of the heart; sighing is consequently the indication of physical weakness or mental disquietude, as Ps 12 5; 31 10; 79 11; Isa 21 2; 24 7; 35 10; Jer 45 3.

Nā'aḳ is the crying of persons dying or starving, as in Ezk 30 24; Job 24 12. A somewhat similar word, hāghāh, means the complaining sound like that of the cooing of doves (Isa 59 11; Nah 2 7). Nehī is the sound of lamentation of the dead (Jer 9 10; 31 15; Am 5 16).

In the NT "groaning" is used for the expression of mental distress. In Jn 11 33.35 the word used is part of the vb. embrimaomai, which conveys the idea of deep and earnest emotion. The same word in two other passages is tr^{d} "strictly charged," and indicates the emphasis of the charge (Mt 9 30; Mk 1 43). Elsewhere "sighing" and "groaning" are renderings of words derived from the vb. stenazō, as in Rom 8 23; 2 Cor 5 2.4; Mk 7 34; 8 12. Stephen calls the groaning of Israel in Egypt stenagmós (Acts 7 34), and the united wail of the travailing creation is expressed by St. Paul by the word sunstenázei (Rom 8 22). The sigh is a characteristic sign of woe in Isa 21 2; 24 7; Jer 45 3; Lam 1 4.8.11.12; Ezk 9 4; 21 6 f.

GROSS, grōs (עֲרָפֶל, 'ărāphel): Used twice with "darkness" in Isa 60 2; Jer 13 16. In the NT the vb. παχύνω, pachúnō, "to make fat," is applied twice to "making gross" the heart (Mt 13 15; Acts 28 27). See Grease.

GROUND, ground, GROUNDED, ground'ed (אֲדָמָה, 'ădhāmāh, אֶרֶץ, 'ereç; γῆ, gē):

(1) "Ground" is in AV the tr of 'ădhāmāh, "the soil," the ground so called from its red color, frequently also tr^{d} "earth" and "land" (Gen 2 5 f, etc; Ex 3 5; 8 21, etc); it is more often the tr of 'ereç, which means rather the earth, oftenest tr^{d} "earth" and "land" (Gen 18 2; Ps 74 7; Isa 3 26, etc); other words are ḥelḳāh, "portion," "field" (2 S 23 12, RV "plot"); ḥārīsh, "ploughing" (1 S 8 12); sādheh, "a plain," "a field" (1 Ch 11 13, RV "plot of ground"); for other special words see Dry; Fallow; Parched.

(2) In the NT the common word for "ground" is gē, "earth," "soil," "land" (Mt 13 8; Acts 7 33, "holy ground," etc); other words are ágros, "field" (Lk 14 18, "I have bought a piece of ground," RV "field"); chōríon, "spot," "place" (Jn 4 5, "parcel of ground").

(3) As past part. of "to grind," "ground" appears as the tr of rīphōth, pounded corn (2 S 17 19, RV "bruised"); "ground" is also the tr of ṭāḥan (Ex 32 20; Nu 11 8; Dt 9 21, RV "grinding").

(4) "Ground," as the basis or foundation of anything, occurs in 1 Tim 3 15 as the tr of hedraíōma (from édaphos), "the pillar and ground of the truth," RVm "stay."

"Grounded" is used in the sense of founded, based, fixed in (Isa 30 32), "and in every place where the grounded staff shall pass, which the Lord shall lay upon him," AVm "Heb every passing of the rod founded," RV "and every stroke [m "Heb passing"] of the appointed staff [m "Or staff of doom (Heb foundation)"], which Jeh shall lay upon him"; following, ver 31, "with his rod will he [Jeh] smite him"; Delitzsch, "every stroke of the rod of destiny which Jeh causes to fall upon Asshur"; the word is mūsādhāh, from yāsadh, "to place," "to found," "to appoint," "to ordain," hence "appointed rod [of punishment]," seems the simplest rendering.

In Eph 3 17 we have "rooted and grounded in love," and in Col 1 23, "if ye continue in the faith, grounded and settled," RV "steadfast," both themelióō, "to lay a foundation." In Ecclus 18 6 "ground" is used for the "bottom of things," but RV has "to track them out" (exichneúō), "to trace out."

(5) Figurative uses of "ground" are as representing the heart in relation to its reception of words of truth and righteousness (Jer 4 3; Hos 10 12, "Break up your fallow ground"); to the word of the kingdom as preached by Christ (Mt 13 8.23); dry, parched, thirsty ground stands for a poor condition (Ps 107 33.35; Isa 35 7; 44 3; 53 2; Ezk 19 13).

GROVE, grōv: (1) אֲשֵׁרָה, 'ăshērāh. See Asherah. (2) אֵשֶׁל, 'ēshel (Gen 21 33 AV, RV "a tamarisk tree"). See Tamarisk.

GRUDGE, gruj (נָטַר, nāṭar; στενάζω, stenázō, γογγυσμός, goggusmós): "Grudge" (perhaps a mimetic word, cf Gr grú) is "to grumble" or "murmur" at any person or thing, to entertain an envious or covetous feeling, to do or give anything unwillingly, etc. It occurs in AV as the tr of nāṭar, "to keep [anger]" (Lev 19 18, "Thou shalt not . . . . bear any grudge against the children of thy people"); in Ps 59 15, as the tr, in text, of Heb lūn or līn, "to pass the night," "to tarry," Niphal, "to show oneself obstinate," "to murmur or complain" (of the enemies who were hunting David like dogs), "Let them wander up and down for meat, and grudge if they be not satisfied," m "If they be not satisfied then will they stay all night," RV "And tarry all night if they be not satisfied"; but see Ex 15 24; 16 2; Nu 14 2; Josh 9 18, etc, where the tr is "murmur"; may not the meaning be "and growl [or howl] if they be not satisfied"? "Grudge" formerly implied open expression of discontent, etc, e.g. Wyclif has in Lk 15 2, "The farisies and scribis grucchiden seiynge," etc.

In Jas 5 9, stenazō, "to groan," "to complain" (from affliction or from impatience or ill-humor), is tr^{d} "grudge," "Grudge not one against another, brethren," RV "murmur not"; goggusmos, "a murmuring" (cf Jn 7 12 f; Acts 6 1), is rendered "grudging" (1 Pet 4 9), "Use hospitality one to another without grudging," RV "murmuring"; cf Phil 2 14; mḗ ek lúpēs, "not out of grief," is "without grudging" (2 Cor 9 7, RV "not grudgingly," m "Gr of sorrow"); in Ecclus 10 25 we have "will not grudge" (goggúzō), RV "murmur."

"Grudge" was frequent in the earlier VSS, but is changed in AV for the most part into "murmur"; RV completes the change, except Lev 19 18, and text of 2 Cor 9 7.

GUARD, gärd: (1) שַׂר הַטַּבָּחִים, sar ha-ṭabbāḥīm, "captain of the guard," lit. "slaughterers" (Gen 37 36; 39 1; 40 3.4; 41 10.12); רַב־טַבָּחִים, rabh ṭabbāḥīm (2 K 25 8.11.20; Jer 39 9, etc); רַב טַבָּחַיָּה, rabh tabbāḥayyāh (Dnl 2 14); רָצִים, rāçīm, "guard," AV "footmen" (1 S 22 17); sārē hā-rāçīm, "chief of the guard," AV "captains of the guard" (1 K 14 27); tā' hā-rāçīm, "guard-chamber" (1 K 14 28; cf Ezk 40 21, etc, where "lodges" are "guardrooms"; see A. B. Davidson ad loc.). (2) מִשְׁמָר, mishmār, "guard," a defence to a point of danger (Neh 4 22 f; Ezk 38 7). (3) מִשְׁמַעַת, mishma'ath, "guard" (2 S 23 23, where ARVm and RVm have "council," the body over which Benaiah was set by David and whose functions were perhaps those of consultation). (4) Σπεκουλάτωρ, spekoulátōr, "guard" (Mk 6 27, "a man of Herod's guard," where, as in one or two other cases, St. Mark, writing for Romans, simply transliterates the Lat speculator "a scout," "an executioner," as in loc.). (5) Στρατοπεδάρχης, stratopedárchēs, "captain of the guard" AV, "captain of the praetorian guard" RVm, Acts 28 16. See CAPTAIN. (6) Κουστωδία, koustōdía, "watch" AV, "guard" ARV and RV (Mt 27 65.66; 28 11).

1. Royal Body-Guard

An oriental monarch's body-guard consisted of picked men attached to his person and ready to fulfil his pleasure in important and confidential concerns. At the courts of Egypt and Babylon the members of the guard were known as "slaughterers," "executioners" (Gen 37 36 AVm, ARVm and RVm, where Potiphar is called their captain); 2 K 25 8, where Nebuzaradan is called their captain (AVm "chief marshal"). Whether it had ever been the function of the body-guard to kill meat for the royal table there is little directly to show; that they acted as executioners can be well understood. In Israel they were known as "the footmen" (1 S 22 17 AV, ARVm and RVm "runners") who acted as royal messengers or couriers from the time of Saul onward (2 K 10 25; 11 6); and this designation connects them with the couriers of the kings of Persia (Est 3 13.15; 8 14, where our VSS render "posts," though the Heb is rāçīm).

2. Composed of Foreigners

The men of the royal body-guard were usually foreigners like the janissaries of oriental monarchs down to modern times, who prefer to have around their persons warriors uninfluenced by family connection with the people of the land. Rameses II had such a body-guard whose commanders ranked with the great officers of the crown (Maspero, Struggle of the Nations, 766). David's body-guard of 600, known also as the gibbōrīm or "mighty men," consisted of Cherethites, Pelethites, and Gittites (2 S 15 18; 20 23), and we read of Carites (2 K 11 19), who may have been Carians or Cretans, as forming part of the guard at the coronation of King Jehoash.

3. Connection with the Temple

That this guard had duties in connection with the temple as well as the king's house seems clear. That they were employed as slaughterers of the sacrifices before the Levites were intrusted with the office is unlikely, inasmuch as this guard is not said to have been composed of "slaughterers" but of "runners." But they accompanied King Rehoboam when he visited the temple (1 K 14 28), and to their captains were committed the shields of brass which took the place of the shields of gold which Solomon had hung up in the temple; Jehoiada employed their captains to put Athaliah to death and to exterminate the worshippers of Baal who had fled to the temple precincts (2 K 11 4 ff); the temple gate leading to the palace was called "the gate of the guard" (2 K 11 19). At this time, and for this occasion, at least, the royal body-guard were the temple guards; and when Ezekiel drew up his plans for the temple which he conceived to replace the temple destroyed by Nebuchadrezzar, the "lodges" or "little chambers" were rooms for the accommodation of the temple guard (Ezk 40 7.10.21.33, etc).

GUARDIAN, gär′di-an. See FAMILY; ANGEL.

GUDGODAH, gud-gō′da (גֻּדְגֹּדָה, gudhgōdhāh): A place in the wilderness journeyings (Dt 10 7), corresponding to Hor-haggidgad in Nu 33 32. LXX in each case renders Γαδγάδ, Gadgád. The site cannot now be identified; but there may be an echo of the ancient name in that of Wādy Guḍāghiḍ, a confluent of Wādy Jerāfeh, which comes down from et Tīh into the 'Arabah nearly due W. of Petra. There are difficulties, however, as the consonants do not correspond.

GUEST, gest (קָרָא, ḳārā'; ἀνάκειμαι, anákeimai): Oriental customs growing out of a nomadic life demand a greater abandon and freedom with respect to the relation of host and guest than are permitted by the conventionalities of western life. A householder is expected to entertain a traveler, and in turn the traveler may accept with perfect ease the hospitality shown without any obligation to pay. See HOSPITALITY. The significance of the word is that of one who is called or invited. A certain sacredness, unknown to modern western society, was attached to the guest, so that a special apartment was set aside for the guests. See GUEST-CHAMBER. In the OT only 3 t is the word itself used, with reference to the guests of Adonijah (1 K 1 41.49), of the foolish woman (Prov 9 18), and of Jeh (Zeph 1 7). In the NT, 3 t (Mt 22 10 f; Lk 19 7 AV, RV "to lodge"). Though but few actual uses of the word occur, there are abounding illustrations of the guest relation in both OT and NT. Esp. is this manifest in the striking social attitudes of Jesus on occasions. Notable among these are the hospitality of Matthew (Lk 5 29 ff); Jesus' relation to Martha and Mary (10 38 ff), and His entrance into the home of Zacchaeus (Lk 19 1 ff). Likewise Jesus spoke frequently of the relation which should exist between the guest and his host (see Lk 7 44–46; Mt 25 35; 10 40).

GUEST-CHAMBER, gest′chām-bẽr: The tr of (1) לִשְׁכָּה, lishkāh (1 S 9 22, AV "parlor"), and (2) κατάλυμα, katáluma (Mk 14 14 ‖ Lk 22 11). The lishkāh was probably a room in which the sacrificial feasts were held. Kataluma is derived from katalúō, which means "to slacken," i.e. the ropes of the beasts of burden, and hence "to lodge." Kataluma has accordingly often the sense of "inn," but as used in Mk and Lk it has the narrower meaning of a room in which to eat.

GUIDE, gīd (אַלּוּף, 'allūph, נָחַל, nāḥal, נָחָה, nāḥāh; ὁδηγός, hodēgós, ὁδηγέω, hodēgéō): "Guide" (noun) is the tr of 'allūph, "an intimate," "a friend," the leader of a family or tribe: Ps 55 13, "a man mine equal, my guide," RV "my companion"; Prov 2 17, "the guide of her youth," RV "friend," m "or guide"; Jer 3 4, "My father, thou [art] the guide of my youth," RVm "companion"; Mic 7 5, "Put ye not confidence in a guide," ARV "in a friend," m "confidant" (which the context shows to be the meaning), ERV "guide," m "familiar friend"; once of ḳāçīn, "a judge," "a military leader or commander" (cf Josh 10 24; Dnl 11 18); Prov 6 7, RV "chief," m "judge"; once nāhagh, "to lead," is trd "guide" (Ps 48 14). In the NT hodēgos, "a way-leader," is trd "guide" (Mt 23 16, "ye blind guides"; 23 24; Acts 1 16; Rom 2 19); "to guide" is the tr of nāḥāh, "to lead forth" (Job 38 32; Ps 73 24); once of 'āshar, Piel, "to guide" or "lead straight" (Prov 23 19); of yā'aç, "to command," "to give counsel" ("I will guide thee with mine eye," RV "I will counsel thee with mine eye upon thee," Ps 32 8); of kūl, "to contain," "to sustain" (Ps 112 5, "He will guide his affairs with discretion," RV "He shall maintain his cause in judgment"); of nāhagh, "to drive," "to lead" (Ps 78 52); of hodēgeō, "to show the way," "guide" (Jn 16 13, "He shall guide you into all truth," RV "the truth"; Acts 8 31); oikodespotéō is tr^d "to guide the house," RV "rule the household" (1 Tim 5 14); the word means lit. to be a house-master (the head of the house).

RV has "guide" for "lead" (Ps 25 5; Mt 15 14; Lk 6 39; Rev 7 17); "a guide to" for "more excellent than" (Prov 12 26); "guided" for "brought in" (Ps 78 26); "guideth" for "maketh" (2 S 22 33), for "leadeth" (Ps 23 3); "my heart yet guiding me," m "holding its course," for "yet acquainting mine heart" (Eccl 2 3).
"Guide-posts" is substituted for "high heaps" (Jer 31 21).

GUILE, gil (מִרְמָה, mirmāh; δόλος, dólos): "Guile" is twice the tr of mirmāh, "fraud," "deceit" (Ps 34 13, "Keep . . . . thy lips from speaking guile"; 55 11, "deceit and guile," RV "oppression [m "fraud"] and guile"); once of 'ormāh, "craftiness," "guile" (Ex 21 14); once of r^{e}mīyāh, "deception," "fraud" (Ps 32 2, "in whose spirit there is no guile"); in the NT of dolos, "bait," hence generally, "fraud," "guile," "deceit"; LXX for mirmāh (Isa 53 9, EV "deceit") and for r^{e}mīyāh (Job 13 7, EV "deceitfully"; Jn 1 47; 2 Cor 12 16, "Being crafty, I caught you with guile"; 1 Thess 2 3; 1 Pet 2 1; 2 22; 3 10, quoted from Ps 34 13; Rev 14 5, "In their mouth was found no guile," RV after corrected text, "no lie").

St. Paul's words in 2 Cor 12 16 have sometimes been quoted in justification of "guile" in religious work, etc; but he is not describing his actual procedure; but that which the Corinthians might have attributed to him; the lips of the Christian must be kept free from all guile (Ps 34 13; 1 Pet 2 1, etc; Wisd 1 5, "A holy spirit of discipline will flee deceit" [dolos], RV "A holy spirit"). "Guile" does not appear in Apoc; dolos is frequently rendered "deceit."

RV has "guile" for "subtilty" (Gen 27 35; Acts 13 10); "cover itself with guile" for "is covered by deceit" (Prov 26 26); "with guile" for "deceitfully" (Gen 34 13); "spiritual milk which is without guile" for "sincere milk of the word," ERVm "reasonable," ARVm "Gr belonging to the reason" (cf Rom 12 1; 1 Pet 2 2); "guileless" for "harmless" (He 7 26).

GUILT, gilt: The Christian idea of guilt involves three elements: responsibility (Gr aitía, "cause," depending upon a man's real freedom), blameworthiness (Lat reatus culpae, depending upon a man's knowledge and purpose) and the obligation to make good through punishment or compensation (Lat reatus poenae; cf Gr opheílēma, "debt," Mt 6 12). In other words, in thinking of guilt we ask the questions of cause, motive and consequence, the central idea being that of the personal blameworthiness of the sinner.

1. The Ritualistic and Legalistic Conception

I. In the OT.—Not all of this is found at once in the OT. The idea of guilt corresponds to that of righteousness or holiness. When these are ritual and legal, instead of ethical and spiritual, they will determine similarly the idea of guilt. This legalistic and ritualistic conception of guilt may first be noted. Personal blameworthiness does not need to be present. "If any one sin, and do any of the things which Jeh hath commanded not to be done; though he knew it not, yet is he guilty, and shall bear his iniquity" (Lev 5 17). The man is guilty, not because he might or should have known; he may merely have touched unwittingly the body of an unclean beast (Lev 5 2.3). The guilt is here because the law has been transgressed and must be made good (cf Lev 5 15.16; 4 2.3.13.22.27; see also 5 2.3.4.17).

Moreover, the element of personal responsibility is sometimes lacking where guilt is assigned. The priest may sin "so as to bring guilt on the people" (Lev 4 3). One man's wrongdoing may "cause the land to sin" (Dt 24 4). Israel has sinned in Achan's greed and therefore suffers. Even when the guilty man is found, his children and his very cattle must bear the guilt and punishment with him, though there is no suggestion of their participation or even knowledge (Josh 7; cf 2 S 24). Here the full moral idea of sin and guilt is wanting because the idea of personality and personal responsibility has not come to its own. The individual is still merged here in the clan or nation.

The central idea in all this is not that of the individual, his responsiblity, his motive, his blame. It is that of a rule and the transgression of it, which must be made good. For this reason we see the ideas of sin and guilt and punishment constantly passing over into each other. This may be seen by noting the use of the words whose common root is 'shm, the distinctive Heb term for guilt. In Lev 5 to 7 in the adj. form it is rendered "guilty," in the noun as "trespass offering." In Hos 5 15 it seems to mean punishment (see m, "have borne their guilt," and cf Ezk 6 6), while in Nu 5 7.8 the idea is that of compensation (rendered "restitution for guilt").

2. Prophetic Teaching

With the prophets, the ideas of sin and righteousness come out more clearly as ethical and personal, and so we mark a similar advance in the conception of guilt. It is not ritual correctness that counts with God, incense and sacrifices and new moons and Sabbaths, but to cease to do evil, to learn to do well (Isa 1). Thus the motive and the inner spirit come in (Mic 6 8; Isa 57 15; 58 1–12), and guilt gains a new depth and quality. At the same time the idea of personal responsibility comes. A man is to bear his own sins. The children's teeth are not to be set on edge because the fathers have eaten sour grapes (Jer 31 29.30; Ezk 18 29–32; 2 K 14 6; cf 2 S 24 17).

1. With Jesus

II. In the NT.—Here as elsewhere Jesus came to fulfil. With Him it is the inner attitude of the soul that decides. It is the penitent publican who goes down justified, not the Pharisee with his long credit account (Lk 18 9–14). That is why His attitude is so kindly toward some notorious sinners and so stern toward some religious leaders. The Pharisees are outwardly correct, but their spirit of bigotry and pride prevents their entering the kingdom of heaven, while the penitent harlots and publicans take it by storm.

Because it is not primarily a matter of the outward deed but of the inner spirit, Jesus marks different degrees of guilt as depending upon a man's knowledge and motive (Lk 11 29–32; 12 47.48; 23 34). And yet Jesus does not lighten the sense of guilt but rather deepens it. The strength of the OT thought lay in this, that it viewed all transgression as a sin against God, since all law came from Him. This religious emphasis remains with Jesus (Lk 15 21; cf Ps 51 4). But with Jesus God is far more than a giver of rules. He gives Himself. And so the guilt is the deeper because the sin is against this love and mercy and fellowship which God offers us. Jesus shows us the final depth of evil in sin. Here comes the NT interpretation of the cross, which shows it on the one hand as the measure of God's love in the free gift of His Son, and on the other as the measure of man's guilt whose sin wrought this and made it necessary.

2. With Paul

Paul also recognizes differences of degree in guilt, the quality of blameworthiness which is not simply determined by looking at the outward transgression (Acts 17 30; Eph 4 18; Rom 2 9; 3 26; 5 13; 7 13). He, too, looks within to decide the question of guilt (Rom 14 23). But sin is not a matter of single acts or choices with Paul. He sees it as a power that comes to rule a man's life and that rules in the race. The question therefore arises, Does Paul think of guilt also as native, as belonging to man because man is a part of the race? Here it can merely be pointed out that Rom 5 12–21 does not necessarily involve this. Paul is not discussing whether all men committed sin in Adam's fall, or whether all are guilty by virtue of their very place in a race that is sinful. It is not the question of guilt in fact or degree, but merely the fact that through one man men are now made righteous as before through one sin came upon them all. This no more involves native guilt as a non-ethical conception than it does the idea that the righteousness through Christ is merely forensic and non-ethical. Paul is simply passing over the other elements to assert one fact. Rom 1 suggests how Paul looked at universal sin as involving guilt because universal knowledge and choice entered in. GUILT OFFERING. See SACRIFICE.

GUILTLESS, gilt'les: The primary meaning of the Heb word is "to be clean." Sometimes the meaning is "freedom from blame," at other times to be "free from punishment," these two ideas running over into each other as with the word "guilt." The latter meaning seems to predominate in Ex 20 7; Dt 5 11; 2 S 14 9; 1 K 2 9. The other meaning holds in Nu 32 22; Josh 2 19; 2 S 3 28; Mt 12 5.7.

GUILTY, gil'ti: In addition to the general discussion under GUILT (q.v.), several NT passages demand special notice because the word "guilty" is not used in the principal sense of blameworthy, but with one of the two lesser meanings noted above which go to make up the complete idea. In 3 of these passages AV renders "guilty" and RV gives another rendering. In Mt 26 66 AV, Jesus' foes declare he is "guilty of death" (ἔνοχος, énochos, "liable to"). Here "guilty" simply means the one who is legally held, and the reference is not to the blame but to the consequence. This is a true use of the word in the lower and legal sense. It does not correspond with our higher usage, and so we have it in RV "worthy of death." So in Rom 3 19, "guilty" is changed to "under the judgment," and in Mt 23 18, to "debtor."

In Jas 2 10 and 1 Cor 11 27, the word "guilty" is also used in the lesser or more primitive sense, not primarily as involving blame but as involving the sinner's authorship or responsibility. This is the first element suggested in the definition of guilt given above, just as the preceding passages illustrate the third element. The man who stumbles in one point is "guilty" of the whole law. James does not refer here to the degree of blameworthiness. "Guilty of" means transgressor of, and he has transgressed the whole because the law is one. So in 1 Cor 11 27, those "guilty of the body and the blood of the Lord" are those who have transgressed in the matter of the body and the blood of the Lord.

GULF (χάσμα, chásma, "a chasm," "vent," "a gaping opening"—a great interval; from χαίνω, chaínō, "to gape" or "yawn"): Occurs only in Lk 16 26, "Between us and you there is a great gulf fixed" (cf "afar off" in ver 23). This is very different from, though it probably reflects, the rabbinical conception of the separation between the two compartments of Hades (Sheol) by "a hand's breadth," "a wall," or even, later, "a chasm," as the parable can be given here only a figurative significance, and is of purely ethical import. The fundamental difference between the Rich Man and Lazarus lies not in their conditions but in their characters. For "besides all this" (ver 26) RVm gives "in all these things," thus implying that the moral distinctions which exist in this life (ver 25) become more pronounced ("fixed") in the next world, and the "gulf" is impassable in the sense that a change of condition will not necessarily produce a change of soul. GUNI, gū'nī, GUNITES, gū'nīts (גּוּנִי, gūnī):

(1) The name of a Naphtalite clan (Gen 46 24; Nu 26 48; 1 Ch 7 13). In Nu 26 48 the gentilic "Gunites" is also found, having in Heb the same form, with the article.

(2) The head of a Gadite family (1 Ch 5 15).

GUR, gûr, THE ASCENT, a-sent', OF (מַעֲלֵה־גוּר, ma'ălēh ghūr): The place where the servants of Jehu mortally wounded Ahaziah, king of Judah (2 K 9 27). The ascent (AV "going up") was hard by Ibleam, the site of which is identified about ½ mile S. of Jenin.

GUR-BAAL, gûr-bā'al (גּוּר־בַּעַל, gūr ba'al): The residence of certain Arabs against whom God helped Uzziah, king of Judah (2 Ch 26 7). Its mention immediately after the Philis may have suggested the "Gerar" of the Tg. Association with the Meunim points to the E. It may be taken as certain that Jebel Neby Hārūn, near Petra, has always been crowned by a sanctuary. This may have been "the dwelling place of Baal"; or, accepting Kittel's emendation (ṭūr ba'al), "the rock" or "mountain of Baal." The Arabs probably dwelt in the region before the days of Petra (EB, s.v.)

HAAHASHTARI, hā-a-hash′ta-rī (הָאֲחַשְׁתָּרִי, hā-'ăḥashtārī, possibly a corruption of הָאַשְׁחוּרִי, hā-'ashḥūrī): A descendant of Judah (1 Ch 4 6). The name is probably corrupt. If the emendation suggested above is accepted, it means the Ashhurites, and is a description of the preceding names.

HABAIAH, ha-bā′ya, HOBAIAH (חֲבָיָה, ḥă-bhāyāh, חֳבָיָה, ḥŏbhāyāh): A post-exilic priestly family which was unable to establish its pedigree. 1. Name

I. The Author.—Habakkuk (חֲבַקּוּק, ḥăbhakkūḳ) means "embrace," or "ardent embrace." Some of the ancient rabbis, connecting the name with 2 K 4 16, "Thou shalt embrace a son," imagined that the prophet was the son of the Shunammite woman. The LXX form of the name, Hambakoúm, Theod. Hambakouk, presupposes the Heb ḥabbaḳūḳ. A similar word occurs in Assyr as the name of a garden plant.

2. Life

Practically nothing is known of Habakkuk. The book bearing his name throws little light upon his life, and the rest of the OT is silent concerning him; but numerous legends have grown up around his name. The identification of the prophet with the son of the Shunammite woman is one. Another, connecting Isa 21 6 with Hab 2 1, makes Habakkuk the watchman set by Isaiah to watch for the fall of Babylon. One of the recensions of the LXX text of Bel declares that the story was taken "from the prophecy of Habakkuk, the son of Jesus of the tribe of Levi." This must refer to an unknown apocryphal book ascribed to our prophet. What authority there may be for calling his father Jesus we do not know. The claim that he was of the tribe of Levi may be based upon the presence of the musical note at the end of the third chapter. According to the Lives of the Prophets, ascribed, though perhaps erroneously, to Epiphanius, bishop of Salamis in Cyprus during the latter part of the 4th cent. AD, he belonged to Bēthçōhar, of the tribe of Simeon. A very interesting story is found in Bel (33–39), according to which Habakkuk, while on his way to the field with a bowl of pottage, was taken by an angel, carried to Babylon and placed in the lions' den, where Daniel ate the pottage, when Habakkuk was returned to his own place. According to the Lives, Habakkuk died two years before the return of the exiles from Babylon. All these legends have little or no historical value.

1. Interpretation of Chs 1 and 2

II. The Book.—It is necessary to consider the interpretation of chs 1 and 2 before giving the contents of the book, as a statement of the contents of these chapters will be determined by their interpretation. The different interpretations advocated may be grouped under three heads: (1) According to the first view: 1 2–4: The corruption of Judah; the oppression of the righteous Jews by the wicked Jews, which calls for the Divine manifestation in judgment against the oppressors. 1 5–11: Jeh announces that He is about to send the Chaldaeans to execute judgment. 1 12–17: The prophet is perplexed. He cannot understand how a righteous God can use these barbarians to execute judgment upon a people more righteous than they. He considers even the wicked among the Jews better than the Chaldaeans. 2 1–4: Jeh solves the perplexing problem by announcing that the exaltation of the Chaldaeans will be but temporary; in the end they will meet their doom, while the righteous will live. 2 5–20: Woes against the Chaldaeans.

(2) The second view finds it necessary to change the present arrangement of the verses 1 5–11; in their present position, they will not fit into the interpretation. For this reason Wellhausen and others omit these verses as a later addition; on the other hand, Giesebrecht would place them before 1 2, as the opening verses of the prophecy. The transposition would require a few other minor changes, so as to make the verses a suitable beginning and establish a smooth transition from ver 11 to ver 2. Omitting the troublesome verses, the following outline of the two chapters may be given: 1 2–4: The oppression of the righteous Jews by the wicked Chaldaeans. 1 12–17: Appeal to Jeh on behalf of the Jews against their oppressors. 2 1–4: Jeh promises deliverance (see above). 2 5–20: Woes against the Chaldaeans.

(3) The third view also finds it necessary to alter the present order of verses. Again 1 5–11, in the present position, interferes with the theory; therefore, these verses are given a more suitable place after 2 4. According to this interpretation the outline is as follows: 1 2–4: Oppression of the righteous Jews by the wicked Assyrians (Budde) or Egyptians (G. A. Smith). 1 12–17: Appeal to Jeh on behalf of the oppressed against the oppressor. 2 1–4: Jeh promises deliverance (see above). 1 5–11: The Chaldaeans will be the instrument to execute judgment upon the oppressors and to bring deliverance to the Jews. 2 5–20: Woes against the Assyrians or Egyptians.

A full discussion of these views is not possible in this article (see Eiselen, Minor Prophets, 466–68). It may be sufficient to say that on the whole the first interpretation, which requires no omission or transposition, seems to satisfy most completely the facts in the case.

2. Contents

The contents of chs 1 and 2 are indicated in the preceding paragraph. Ch 3 contains a lyrical passage called in the title "Prayer." The petitioner speaks for himself and the community. He remembers the mighty works of Jeh for His people; the thought of them causes him to tremble; nevertheless, he calls for a repetition of the ancient manifestations (ver 2). In majestic pictures the poet describes the wonderful appearances of Jeh in the past (vs 3–11) for His chosen people (vs 12–15). The remembrance of these manifestations fills the Psalmist with fear and trembling, but also with joy and confidence in the God of his salvation (vs 16–19).

3. Style

Only the Heb student can get an adequate idea of the literary excellence of the Book of Hab. "The literary power of Habakkuk," says Driver, "is considerable. Though his book is a brief one, it is full of force; his descriptions are graphic and powerful; thought and expression are alike poetic; he is still a master of the old classical style, terse, parallelistic, pregnant; there is no trace of the often prosaic diffusiveness which manifests itself in the writings of Jeremiah and Ezekiel. And if ch 3 be his, he is, moreover, a lyric poet of high order; the grand imagery and the rhythmic flow of this ode will bear comparison with some of the finest productions of the Heb muse."

4. Integrity

More than half of the book, including 1 5–11; 2 9–20, and ch 3 entire, has been denied to the prophet Habakkuk. If the prophecy is rightly interpreted (see above), no valid reason for rejecting 1 5–11 can be found. Vs 9–20 of ch 2 are denied to Habakkuk chiefly on two grounds: (1) The "woes" are said to be in part, at least, unsuitable, if supposed to be addressed to the Chaldaean king. This difficulty vanishes when it is borne in mind that the king is not addressed as an individual, but as representing the policy of the nation, as a personification of the nation. (2) Some parts, esp. vs 12–14, "consist largely of citations and reminiscences of other passages, including some late ones" (cf ver 12 with Mic 3 10; ver 13 with Jer 51 58; ver 14 with Isa 11 9; ver 16*b* with Jer 25 15.16; vs 18–20 with Isa 44 9 ff; 46 6.7; Jer 10 1–16). Aside from the fact that the argument from literary parallels is always precarious, in this case the resemblances are few in number and of such general character that they do not necessarily presuppose literary dependence. Ch 3 is denied to the prophet even more persistently, but the arguments are by no means conclusive. The fact that the chapter belongs to the psalm literature does not prove a late date unless it is assumed, without good reasons, that no psalms originated in the preëxilic period. Nor do the historical allusions, which are altogether vague, the style, the relation to other writers, and the character of the religious ideas expressed, point necessarily to a late date. The only doubtful verses are 16 ff, which seem to allude to a calamity other than the invasion of the Chaldaeans; and Driver says, not without reason, "Had the poet been writing under the pressure of a hostile invasion, the invasion itself would naturally have been expected to form a prominent feature in this picture." Hence, while it may be impossible to prove that Habakkuk is the author of the prayer, it is equally impossible to prove the contrary; and while there are a few indications which seem to point to a situation different from that of Habakkuk, they are by no means definite enough to exclude the possibility of Habakkuk's authorship.

III. The Time.—The question of date is closely bound up with that of interpretation. Budde, on the theory that the oppressors, threatened with destruction, are the Assyrians (see above, 3), dates the prophecy 621 to 615 BC. Granting that the Assyrians are in the mind of the prophet, the date suggested by Betteridge (AJT, 1903, 674 ff), c 701 BC, is to be preferred; but if the Assyrians are not the oppressors, then with the Assyrians fall the dates proposed by Budde and Betteridge. If the prophecy is directed against Egypt, we are shut up to a very definite period, between 608 and 604 BC, for the Egyp supremacy in Judah continued during these years only. If the Egyptians are not the oppressors, another date will have to be sought. If the Chaldaeans are the oppressors of Judah, the prophecy must be assigned to a date subsequent to the battle of Carchemish in 605–604, for only after the defeat of the Egyptians could the Chaldaeans carry out a policy of world conquest; and it was some years after that event that the Chaldaeans first came into direct contact with Judah. But on this theory, 1 2–4.12 ff; 2 8 ff, presupposes the lapse of a considerable period of conquest, the subduing of many nations, the cruel oppression of Judah for some length of time; therefore, Nowack is undoubtedly correct, on this theory, in bringing the prophecy down to a period subsequent to the first exile in 597, or, as he says, "in round numbers about 590 BC."

1. Date

A different date must be sought if 1 2–4 is interpreted as referring to the oppression of Jews by Jews, and 1 5 ff, as a threat that Jeh will raise up the Chaldaeans, already known as a nation thirsting for blood, to punish the wickedness of Judah. These verses would seem to indicate (1) that the Chaldaeans had not yet come into direct contact with Judah, and (2) that they had already given exhibitions of the cruel character of their warfare. Nebuchadnezzar advanced against Judah about 600 BC; but the years since the fall of Nineveh, in 607–606, and the battle of Carchemish, in 605–604, had given abundant opportunity to the Chaldaeans to reveal their true character, and to the prophet and his contemporaries to become acquainted with this cruel successor of Nineveh. On this theory, therefore, the prophetic activity of Habakkuk must be assigned to shortly before 600 BC.

2. Occasion

If Habakkuk prophesied about 600 BC, he lived under King Jehoiakim. The pious and well-meaning Josiah had been slain in an attempt to stop the advance of Egypt against Assyria. With his death the brief era of reform came to an end. After a reign of three months Jehoahaz was deposed by Pharaoh-necoh, who placed Jehoiakim on the throne. The latter was selfish, tyrannical and godless. In a short time the deplorable conditions of Manasseh's reign returned. It was this situation that caused the prophet's first perplexity: "O Jeh, how long shall I cry, and thou wilt not hear? I cry out unto thee of violence, and thou wilt not save" (1 2).

IV. Its Teaching.—In the Book of Hab a new type of prophecy appears. The prophets were primarily preachers and teachers of religion and ethics. They addressed themselves to their fellow-countrymen in an attempt to win them back to Jeh and a righteous life. Not so Habakkuk. He addresses himself to Jeh, questioning the justice or even the reality of the Divine Providence. He makes complaint to God and expostulates with Him. The prophet Habakkuk, therefore, is a forerunner of the author of the Book of Job. "As a whole, his book is the fruit of religious reflection. It exhibits the communings and questionings of his soul—representative, no doubt, of many other pious spirits of the time—with God; and records the answers which the Spirit of God taught him for his own sake and for the sake of tried souls in every age."

Habakkuk has been called the prophet of faith. He possessed a strong, living faith in Jeh; but he, like many other pious souls, was troubled and perplexed by the apparent inequalities of life. He found it difficult to reconcile these with his lofty conception of Jeh. Nevertheless, he does not sulk. Boldly he presents his perplexities to Jeh, who points the way to a solution, and the prophet comes forth from his trouble with a faith stronger and more intense than ever. It is in connection with his attempts to solve the perplexing problems raised by the unpunished sins of his countrymen and the unlimited success of the Chaldaeans that Habakkuk gives utterance to two sublime truths:

1. The Universal Supremacy of Jeh

(1) Jeh is interested not only in Israel. Though Habakkuk, like the other prophets, believes in a special Divine Providence over Israel, he is equally convinced that Jeh's rule embraces the whole earth; the destinies of all the nations are in His hand. The Chaldaeans are punished not merely for their sins against Judah, but for the oppression of other nations as well. Being the only God, He cannot permit the worship of other deities. Temporarily the Chaldaeans may worship idols, or make might their god, they may "sacrifice unto their net," and burn incense "unto their drag," because by them "their portion is fat and their food plenteous"; but Jeh is from everlasting, the Holy One, and He will attest His supremacy by utterly destroying the boastful conqueror with his idols.

2. Faithfulness the Guarantee of Permanency

(2) The second important truth is expressed in 2 4: "The righteous shall live by his faith" (ARVm "faithfulness"). Faithfulness assures permanency. The thought expressed by the prophet is not identical with that expressed by the apostle who quotes the words (Gal 3 11); nevertheless, the former also gives expression to a truth of profound significance. "Faithfulness" is with the prophet an external thing; it signifies integrity, fidelity, stedfastness under all provocations; but this implies, in a real sense, the NT conception of faith as an active principle of right conduct. A living faith determines conduct; religion and ethics go hand in hand, and esp. in the hour of adversity a belief in Jeh and unflinching reliance upon Him are the strongest preservers of fidelity and integrity. Faith without works is dead; faith expresses itself in life. Habakkuk places chief emphasis upon the expressions of faith, and he does so rightly; but in doing this he also calls attention, by implication at least, to the motive power behind the external manifestations. As an expression of living faith, 3 17–19 is not surpassed in the OT.

HABAKKUK, THE PRAYER OF. See BETH-HORON, BATTLE OF.

HABAZINIAH (חֲבַצִּנְיָה, ḥăbhaççinyāh. Thus in AV, but more correctly as in RV HABAZZINIAH, hab-a-zi-nī'a [Jer 35 3]): The grandfather of Jaazaniah, who was the leader of the Rechabites who were tested by Jeremiah as to their obedience to their ancestor's command with reference to wine. Their loyalty to the commands of Jonadab was effectively used by Jeremiah in an appeal to the people of Judah to obey the words of Jeh.

HABERGEON, hab'ẽr-jun, ha-bûr'jun, AV (תַּחֲרָא, taḥărā'): In RV, Ex 28 32; 39 23, etc, "coat of mail"; in Job 41 26, "pointed shaft," m "coat of mail." See ARMS, ARMOR.

HABITATION, hab-i-tā'shun: Properly a place of sojourn or dwelling. The term in AV representing some 16 Heb words (mōshābh, mā'ōn, mishkān, nāweh, etc), and 5 Gr words, is variously changed in certain passages in RV, as Gen 49 5, "swords"; Lev 13 46, "dwelling"; Job 5 24; Jer 25 30*b*. 37, "fold"; Ps 89 14; 97 2, etc, "foundation"; Ps 132 5, "tabernacle"; Lk 16 9, "tabernacles," etc. Conversely, "habitation" appears in RV for AV "dwelling place" in 2 Ch 30 27; Ps 79 7, "house"; Ps 83 12; 2 Cor 5 2, "tabernacle," Acts 7 46, etc. See HOUSE. JAMES ORR

HABOR, hā'bor (חָבוֹר, ḥābhōr; ῾Αβώρ, Habôr, ῾Αβιώρ, Habiôr; Isidor of Charax, Aburas ['Αβουράς], Zosias, Aboras): Is described in 2 K

1. Its Position and Course

17 6; 18 11 (cf 1 Ch 5 26) as "the river of Gozan." It is the Arab. Khabur, and flows in a southerly direction from several sources in the mountains of Karaj Dāgh (Mons Masius), which, in the 37th parallel, flanks the valley of the Tigris on the W. The river ultimately joins the Euphrates after receiving its chief tributary, the Jaghjagha Su (Mygdonius), at Circesium (Kirkisiyeh).

2. Etymologies of Habor

The meaning of its name is doubtful, but Delitzsch has suggested a Sumerian etymology, namely, ḫabur, "the fish-waterway," or it may be connected with "mother Ḫubur," a descriptive title of Tiāmat (see MERODACH; RAHAB).

3. Historical References

Layard found several interesting Assyrian remains in the district, including man-headed bulls bearing the name of Mušeš-Ninip, possibly an Assyr governor. Tiglath-pileser I (c 1120 BC) boasts of having killed 10 mighty elephants in Haran and on the banks of the Habor; and Aššur-naṣir-apli (c 880 BC), after conquering Ḫaršit (Ḫarrit, Ḫarmiš), subjugated the tract around piate ša nâr Ḫabur, "the mouths of the Habor." According to 2 K and 1 Ch, Shalmaneser IV and Sargon transported the exiled Israelites thither. Philological considerations exclude the identification of the Chebar of Ezk 1 3, etc, with the Habor.

T. G. PINCHES

HACALIAH, hak-a-lī'a (חֲכַלְיָה, ḥăkhalyāh, meaning doubtful, perhaps "wait for Jeh"; AV Hachaliah): Father of Nehemiah (Neh 1 1; 10 1).

HACHILAH, ha-kī'la, hak'i-la, HILL OF (חֲכִילָה, ḥăkhīlāh): A hill in the wilderness of Judah, associated with the wanderings of David. It is stated (1 S 23 19) to be "on the S. of the desert" (or Jeshimon), and (1 S 26 1) to be "before [on the front (i.e. edge) of] the desert." It was near Ziph and Maon. The only plausible hypothesis is that it is represented by the ridge Dhahreṭ el-Kōlāh in the wilderness of Ziph, toward the desert of En-gedi (PEF, III, 313, Sh XXI).

HACHMONI, hak-mō'nī, hak'mō-nī, or probably HACHMONITE (חַכְמוֹנִי, ḥakhmōnī, "wise"): The same word is rendered "Hachmoni," a proper name, in 1 Ch 27 32 and "a Hachmonite" in 1 Ch 11 11. The form of the Heb word suggests that the latter tr should be adopted in both passages, and that it describes the warrior in one case, and the companion or tutor of David's sons in the other, as a member of a certain family—a Hachmonite of which nothing further is known. 2 S 23 8, "Josheb-basshebeth a Tahchemonite," bears the marks of a corrupt text, and should be ‖ with 1 Ch 11 11 so far as the name goes, reading "Jashobeam the Hachmonite." So Klostermann, Driver, Wellhausen, Budde, etc. GEORGE RICE HOVEY

HADAD, hā'dad:

(1) (חֲדַד, ḥădhadh, "sharpness"): One of the twelve sons of Ishmael (Gen 25 15, where AV, following a mistake in Heb text, has "Hadar"; but "Hadad" is found in ‖ passage 1 Ch 1 30; RV reads "Hadad" in both places).

(2) (הֲדַד, hădhadh): A king of Edom, son of Bedad (Gen 36 35.36 ‖ 1 Ch 1 46.47), "who smote Midian in the field of Moab," and whose "city was Avith."

(3) Another king of Edom, written "Hadar" in Gen 36 39 by a copyist's mistake, but "Hadad" in the ‖ passage 1 Ch 1 50.51. His city was Pau or Pai.

(4) A member of the royal family of Edom in David's time, who as a child escaped Joab's slaughter of the Edomites, and fled to Egypt. On David's death he returned to Edom, where he made trouble for Solomon by stirring up the Edomites against the rule of Israel (1 K 11 14–22.25).

(5) The supreme god of Syria, whose name is found in Scripture in the names of Syrian kings, Benhadad, Hadadezer. The god Hadad (=perhaps, "maker of loud noise") is mentioned in Assyr inscriptions, and called on the monolith of Shalmaneser "the god of Aleppo." In the Assyr inscriptions he is identified with the air-god Rammon or Rimmon. The union of the two names in Zec 12 11 suggests this identity, though the reference is uncertain, some regarding Hadadrimmon as the name of a place, others as the name of the god—"Hadad [is] Rimmon." The name "Hadad" is found in various other forms: Adad, Dadu, and Dadda. See A. H. Sayce in HDB s.v. "Hadad."

HADADEZER, had-ad-ē′zẽr (הֲדַדְעֶזֶר, hădhadh'ezer; so 2 S 8; 1 K 11 23, but הֲדַרְעֶזֶר, hădhar'ezer, 2 S 10; 1 Ch 18): Mentioned in connection with David's wars of conquest (2 S 8 3 ff; 2 S 10 1–19; 1 Ch 18 3 ff); was king of Zobah in Syria. The exact position and size of this Syrian principality are uncertain, but it seems to have extended in David's time southward toward Ammon and eastward to the Euphrates. When the Ammonites had put themselves in the wrong with David by the insult done to his ambassadors (2 S 10 1–5) they summoned to their aid against the incensed king of Israel the Syrians of various adjoining principalities, among them the Syrians of Zobah under Hadadezer, the son of Rehob. The strategy of Joab, who set the force under command of Abishai his brother in array against the Ammonites, and himself attacked the Syrian allies, won for Israel a decisive victory. Not content with this result, Hadadezer gathered together another Syrian force, summoning this time also "the Syrians that were beyond the River" (2 S 10 16), with Shobach the captain of his host at their head. On this occasion David himself took command of the Israelitish forces, and again defeated them near Helam, Shobach being left dead on the field. Hadadezer and his Syrian vassals, finding resistance hopeless, "made peace with Israel, and served them" (2 S 10 19). For the name Hadad- or Hadarezer, see Benhadad.

HADADRIMMON, hā-dad-rim′on, had-ad-rim′-on (הֲדַד רִמּוֹן, hădhadh rimmōn): A name which occurs, along with Megiddon, in Zec 12 11. It was long thought that this was a place in the plain of Megiddo, and that the mourning referred to was that for Josiah, slain in battle with Pharaoh-necoh (2 K 23 29). This last, however, was certainly at Jerus. Jerome (Comm. on Zec) identifies Hadadrimmon with Maximianopolis, a village near Jezreel, probably Legio, the ancient Megiddo. Possibly, however, the form "Hadadrimmon" has arisen through the combination of two divine names; and the weeping may be that for Tammuz (Ezk 8 14), with whom the old Sem deity had become confused in the popular mind.

HADAREZER, had-ar-ē′zẽr. See Hadadezer.

HADASHAH, ha-dā′sha, had′a-sha (חֲדָשָׁה, ḥădhāshāh, "new"): A town in the Shephelah of Judah, named with Zenan and Migdal-gad (Josh 15 37). According to the Mish ('Ērūbhīn, v. 6), it was the smallest town in Judah. It is not identified.

HADASSAH, ha-das′a (הֲדַסָּה, hădhaṣṣāh, "myrtle"): The Heb name (Est 2 7) formerly borne by Esther (q.v.).

HADATTAH, ha-dat′a (חֲדַתָּה, ḥădhattāh, "new"): See Hazor.

HADES, hā′dēz (῞Αιδης, Haídēs, ᾅδης, haídēs, "not to be seen"): Hades, Gr originally Haídou, in genitive, "the house of Hades," then, as nominative, designation of the abode of the dead itself. The word occurs in the NT in Mt 11 23 (‖ Lk 10 15); 16 18; Lk 16 23; Acts 2 27.31; Rev 1 18; 6 8; 20 13 f. It is also found in TR 1 Cor 15 55, but here the correct reading (Tischendorf, WH, RV) is probably Thánate, "O Death," instead of Háidē, "O Hades." AV renders "Hades" by "hell" in all instances except 1 Cor 15 55, where it puts "grave" (m "hell") in dependence on Hos 13 14. RV everywhere has "Hades."

1. In OT: Sheol

In the LXX Hades is the standing equivalent for Sheol, but also translates other terms associated with death and the state after it. The Gr conception of Hades was that of a locality receiving into itself all the dead, but divided into two regions, one a place of torment, the other of blessedness. This conception should not be rashly transferred to the NT, for the latter stands not under the influence of Gr pagan belief, but gives a teaching and reflects a belief which model their idea of Hades upon the OT through the LXX. The OT Sheol, while formally resembling the Gr Hades in that it is the common receptacle of all the dead, differs from it, on the one hand, by the absence of a clearly defined division into two parts, and, on the other hand, by the emphasis placed on its association with death and the grave as abnormal facts following in the wake of sin. The OT thus concentrates the partial light it throws on the state after death on the negative, undesirable side of the prospect apart from redemption. When in the progress of OT revelation the state after death begins to assume more definite features, and becomes more sharply differentiated in dependence on the religious and moral issue of the present life, this is not accomplished in the canonical writings (otherwise in the apocalyptic literature) by dividing Sheol into two compartments, but by holding forth to the righteous the promise of deliverance from Sheol, so that the latter becomes more definitely outlined as a place of evil and punishment.

2. In NT: Hades

The NT passages mark a distinct stage in this process, and there is, accordingly, a true basis in Scripture for the identification in a certain aspect of Sheol—Hades—with hell as reflected in AV. The theory according to which Hades is still in the NT the undifferentiated provisional abode of all the dead until the day of judgment, with the possibility of ultimate salvation even for those of its inmates who have not been saved in this life, is neither in harmony with the above development nor borne out by the facts of NT usage. That dead believers abide in a local Hades cannot be proven from 1 Thess 4 16; 1 Cor 15 23, for these passages refer to the grave and the body, not to a gathering-place of the dead. On the other hand Lk 23 43; 2 Cor 5 6–8; Phil 1 23; Rev 6 9; 7 9 ff; 15 2 ff teach that the abode of believers immediately after death is with Christ and God.

3. Acts 2:27.31 It is, of course, a different matter, when Hades, as not unfrequently already the OT Sheol, designates not the place of the dead but the state of death or disembodied existence. In this sense even the soul of Jesus was in Hades according to Peter's statement (Acts 2 27.31—on the basis of Ps 16 10). Here the abstract sense is determined by the parallel expression, "to see corruption." None the less from a comparatively early date this passage has been quoted in support of the doctrine of a local descent of Christ into Hades.

4. Rev 20:13; 6:8; 1:18 The same abstract meaning is indicated for Rev 20 13. Death and Hades are here represented as delivering up the dead on the eve of the final judgment. If this is more than a poetic duplication of terms, Hades will stand for the personified state of death, Death for the personified cause of this state. The personification appears plainly from ver 14: "Death and Hades were cast into the lake of fire." In the number of these "dead" delivered up by Hades, believers are included, because, even on the chiliastic interpretation of vs 4–6, not all the saints share in the first resurrection, but only those "beheaded for the testimony of Jesus, and for the word of God," i.e. the martyrs. A similar personifying combination of Death and Hades occurs in Rev 6 8 ("a pale horse: and he that sat upon him, his name was Death; and Hades followed with him"). In Rev 1 18, on the other hand, Death and Hades are represented as prisons from which Christ, in virtue of His own resurrection, has the power to deliver, a representation which again implies that in some, not necessarily local, sense believers also are kept in Hades.

5. Lk 16:23 In distinction from these passages when the abstract meaning prevails and the local conception is in abeyance, the remaining references are more or less locally conceived. Of these Lk 16 23 is the only one which might seem to teach that recipients of salvation enter after death into Hades as a place of abode. It has been held that Hades is here the comprehensive designation of the locality where the dead reside, and is divided into two regions, "the bosom of Abraham" and the place of torment, a representation for which Jewish parallels can be quoted, aside from its resemblance to the Gr bisection of Hades. Against this view, however, it may be urged, that if "the bosom of Abraham" were conceived as one of the two divisions of Hades, the other division would have been named with equal concreteness in connection with Dives. In point of fact, the distinction is not between "the bosom of Abraham" and another place, as both included in Hades, but between "the bosom of Abraham" and Hades as antithetical and exclusive. The very form of the description of the experience of Dives: "In Hades he lifted up his eyes, being in torments," leads us to associate Hades as such with pain and punishment. The passage, therefore, does not prove that the saved are after death in Hades. In further estimating its bearing upon the problem of the local conditions of the disembodied life after death, the parabolic character of the representation must be taken into account. The parable is certainly not intended to give us topographical information about the realm of the dead, although it presupposes that there is a distinct place of abode for the righteous and wicked respectively.

6. Mt 11:23 The two other passages where Hades occurs in the teaching of Our Lord (Mt 11 23 ‖ Lk 10 15; and Mt 16 18) make a metaphorical use of the conception, which, however, is based on the local sense. In the former utterance it is predicted of Capernaum that it shall in punishment for its unbelief "go down unto Hades." As in the OT Sheol is a figure for the greatest depths known (Dt 32 22; Isa 7 11; 57 9; Job 11 8; 26 6), this seems to be a figure for the extreme of humiliation to which that city was to be reduced in the course of history. It is true, ver 24, with its mention of the day of judgment, might seem to favor an eschatological reference to the ultimate doom of the unbelieving inhabitants, but the usual restriction of Hades to the punishment of the intermediate state (see below) is against this.

7. Mt 16:18 In the other passage, Mt 16 18, Jesus declares that the gates of Hades shall not katischúein the church He intends to build. The vb. katischuein may be rendered, "to overpower" or "to surpass." If the former be adopted, the figure implied is that of Hades as a stronghold of the power of evil or death from which warriors stream forth to assail the church as the realm of life. On the other rendering there is no reference to any conflict between Hades and the church, the point of comparison being merely the strength of the church, the gates of Hades, i.e. the realm of death, serving in common parlance as a figure of the greatest conceivable strength, because they never allow to escape what has once entered through them.

The above survey of the passages tends to show that Hades, where it is locally conceived, is not a provisional receptacle for all the dead, but plainly associated with the punishment of the wicked. Where it comes under consideration for the righteous there is nothing to indicate a local sense. On 1 Pet 3 19; 4 6 (where, however, the word "Hades" does not occur), see arts. ESCHATOLOGY OF THE NT; SPIRITS IN PRISON.

8. Not a Final State The element of truth in the theory of the provisional character of Hades lies in this, that the NT never employs it in connection with the final state of punishment, as subsequent to the last judgment. For this GEHENNA (q.v.) and other terms are used. Dives is represented as being in Hades immediately after his death and while his brethren are still in this present life. Whether the implied differentiation between stages of punishment, depending obviously on the difference between the disembodied and reëmbodied state of the lost, also carries with itself a distinction between two places of punishment, in other words whether Hades and Gehenna are locally distinct, the evidence is scarcely sufficient to determine. The NT places the emphasis on the eschatological developments at the end, and leaves many things connected with the intermediate state in darkness. GEERHARDUS VOS

HADID, hā′did (חָדִיד, ḥādhīdh): A city in Benjamin (Neh 11 33 f) named with Lod and Ono (Ezr 2 33; Neh 7 37), probably identical with Adida (LXX Ἀδιδά, Hadidá) of 1 Macc 12 38; 13 13, "over against the plain," which was fortified by Simon Maccabaeus. It is represented by the modern el-Ḥadītheh, about 3 miles N.E. of Lydda.

HADLAI, had′lī, had′lȧ-ī (חַדְלָי, ḥadhlāy, "resting"): An Ephraimite (2 Ch 28 12), father of Amasa, who was one of the heads of the tribe in the time of Pekah, king of Israel.

HADORAM, ha-dō′ram (הֲדוֹרָם, hădhōrām):

(1) Son of Joktan and apparently 6th in descent from Noah (Gen 10 27 ‖ 1 Ch 1 21).

(2) Son of Tou, king of Hamath, sent by his father with presents to King David (1 Ch 18 10). In 2 S 8 9.10, written probably incorrectly "Joram," "son of Toi."

(3) Rehoboam's superintendent of the forced labor department (2 Ch 10 18), called Adoram 1 K 12 18, a contraction of Adoniram (which see). He was sent by Rehoboam as messenger to Israel at the time of the revolt of the ten tribes and was stoned to death by them. George Rice Hovey

HADRACH, hā′drak, had′rak (חַדְרָךְ, ḥadhrākh): "The land of Hadrach" is mentioned only once in Scripture (Zec 9 1), and there it is grouped with Damascus, Hamath, Tyre and Sidon. It may be safely identified with the "Hatarikka" of the Assyr inscriptions, against which Assur-dan III made expeditions in his 1st (772 BC), 8th and 18th years. It also appears in inscriptions of Tiglath-pileser III. They place it in the N. of Lebanon.

HAGAB, hā′gab (חָגָב, ḥāghābh, "locust"): Ancestor of some of the Nethinim who returned from the Bab captivity with Zerubbabel and Nehemiah. The name occurs second after Hagabah in Ezr 2 46, but is omitted entirely from the ‖ list of Neh 7 48.

HAGABA, ha-gā′ba, hag′a-bä (חֲגָבָא, ḥăghābhā'): Same as the following (Neh 7 48).

HAGABAH, ha-gā′ba, hag′a-bä (חֲגָבָה, ḥăghābhāh, "locust"): Like Hagab, an ancestor of some of the Nethinim who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 45); spelled Hagaba in the ‖ passage (Neh 7 48).

HAGAR, hā′gar (הָגָר, hāghār, "emigration," "flight"; Ἁγάρ, Hagár, Ἄγαρ, Ágar): An Egyp woman, the handmaid or slave of Sarai; a present, perhaps, from Pharaoh when Abram dissembled to him in Egypt (Gen 12 16). Mention is made of her in two passages (Gen 16; 21 8–21).

1. The Scornful Handmaid and Her Flight

In the first narrative (Gen 16) it is related that Sarai, despairing at her age of having children, gave Hagar to Abram as a concubine. As Hagar was not an ordinary household slave but the peculiar property of her mistress (cf 29 24.29), any offspring which she might bear to Abram would be reckoned as Sarai's (cf 30 3–9). In the prospect of becoming a mother, Hagar, forgetting her position, seems to have assumed an insolent bearing toward her childless mistress. Sarai felt keenly the contempt shown her by her handmaid, and in angry tones brought her conduct before Abram. Now that her plan was not working out smoothly, she unfairly blamed her husband for what originated with herself, and appealed to Heaven to redress her grievance. Abram refused to interfere in the domestic quarrel, and renouncing his rights over his concubine, and her claims on him, put her entirely at Sarai's disposal. Under the harsh treatment of her mistress Hagar's life became intolerable, and she fled into the wilderness, turning her steps naturally toward Egypt, her native land.

2. Her Vision and Return

But the angel of Jeh (who is here introduced for the first time as the medium of the theophany) appeared to her as she was resting by a spring and commanded her to return and submit herself to her mistress, promising her an innumerable seed through her unborn son, concerning whom he uttered a striking prediction (see Ishmael). To the angel (who is now said to be Jeh Himself) Hagar gave the name "Thou art a God of seeing" (RV "that seeth"), for she said, "Have I even here [in the desert where God, whose manifestations were supposed to be confined to particular places, might not be expected to reveal Himself] looked after him that seeth me?"—the meaning being that while God saw her, it was only while the all-seeing God in the person of His angel was departing that she became conscious of His presence. The spring where the angel met with her was called in Heb tradition B^{e}'ēr-laḥay-rō'ī, "the well of the living one who seeth me" (RVm).

Obedient to the heavenly vision Hagar returned, as the narrative implies, to her mistress and gave birth to Ishmael, Abram being then eighty-six years old.

The idea in ver 13 is not very clearly expressed. The word tr^{d} "here" generally means "hither," and there is no explanation of the "living one" in the name of the well. It has therefore been proposed to emend the Heb text and read "Have I even seen God, and lived after my seeing?"—an allusion to the belief that no one could "see God and live" (cf Gen 32 30; Ex 33 20). But there are difficulties in the way of accepting this emendation. The name of God, "a God of seeing," would require to be interpreted in an objective sense as "a God who is seen," and the consequent name of the well, "He that seeth me liveth," would make God, not Hagar, as in ver 13, the speaker.

The other narrative (Gen 21 8–21) relates what occurred in connection with the weaning of Isaac.

3. Her Harsh Expulsion and Divine Help

The presence and conduct of Ishmael during the family feast held on the occasion roused the anger and jealousy of Sarah who, fearing that Ishmael would share the inheritance with Isaac, peremptorily demanded the expulsion of the slave-mother and her son. But the instincts of Abraham's fatherly heart recoiled from such a cruel course, and it was only after the revelation was made to him that the ejection of Hagar and her son would be in the line of the Divine purpose—for Isaac was his real seed, while Ishmael would be made a nation too—that he was led to forego his natural feelings and accede to Sarah's demand. So next morning the bondwoman and her son were sent forth with the bare provision of bread and a skin of water into the wilderness of Beersheba. When the water was spent, Hagar, unable to bear the sight of her boy dying from thirst, laid him under a shrub and withdrew the distance of a bowshot to weep out her sorrow. But the angel of God, calling to her out of heaven, comforted her with the assurance that God had heard the voice of the lad and that there was a great future before him. Then her eyes were opened to discover a well of water from which she filled the skin and gave her son to drink. With God's blessing the lad grew up amid the desert's hardships, distinguished for his skill with the bow. He made his home in the wilderness of Paran, and his mother took a wife for him out of her own country.

4. Practical Lessons from the History

The life and experience of Hagar teach, among other truths, the temptations incident to a new position; the foolishness of hasty action in times of trial and difficulty; the care exercised over the lonely by the all-seeing God; the Divine purpose in the life of everyone, however obscure and friendless; how God works out His gracious purposes by seemingly harsh methods; and the strength, comfort and encouragement that ever accompany the hardest experiences of His children.

5. Critical Points in the Documents

Ch 16 belongs to J (except vs 1*a*.3.15 f which are from P), and 21 8–21 to E. From the nature of the variations in the narratives many critics hold that we have here two different accounts of the same incident. But the narratives as they stand seem to be quite distinct, the one referring to Hagar's flight before the birth of Ishmael, and the other to her expulsion at the weaning of Isaac. It is said, however, that E represents Ishmael as a child "playing" (RVm, LXX παίζοντα, paízonta) with Isaac at the weaning festival, and young enough to be carried by his mother and "cast" under a shrub; while according to P (16 16; 21 5), as a child was weaned at the age of two or three years, he would be a lad of sixteen at that time. The argument for the double narrative here does not seem conclusive. The word m^eçaḥēḳ (ver 9) does not necessarily mean "playing" when used absolutely; it is so used in ch 19 14, evidently in the sense of "mocking" or "jesting," and Delitzsch gives it that meaning there. Then as to ver 14, the MT does not state that the child was put on her shoulder, although the LXX does; nor does "cast" (ver 15) so "clearly imply" that Ishmael was an infant carried by his mother (cf Mt 15 30). It may be added that the words yeledh and na'ar, tr^d "child" and "lad" respectively, determine nothing as to age, as they are each used elsewhere in both senses.

6. Allegorical Use of the Story by St. Paul

In Gal 4 21 ff St. Paul makes an allegorical use of this episode in the history of Ishmael and Isaac to support his argument for the transitory character of the Jewish ritual and the final triumph of Christian freedom over all Judaizing tendencies. In elaborating his reference, the apostle institutes a series of contrasts. Hagar, the bondwoman, represents the old covenant which was given from Mt. Sinai; and as Ishmael was Abraham's son after the flesh, so the Judaizing Christians, who wish to remain in bondage to the law, are Hagar's children. On the other hand, Sarah, the freewoman, represents the new covenant instituted by Christ; and as Isaac was born to Abraham in virtue of the promise, so the Christians who have freed themselves entirely from the law of carnal ordinances and live by faith are Sarah's children. Thus Hagar corresponds to "the Jerus that now is," that is, the Jewish state which is in spiritual bondage with her children; while Sarah represents "the Jerus that is above," "our mother" (RV), the mother of us Christians, that free spiritual city to which Christians even now belong (Phil 3 20). By this allegory the apostle would warn the Galatian Christians of the danger which beset them from their Judaizing brethren, of their subjection to the covenant of works and their ultimate expulsion from the household of faith.

To us St. Paul's reference does not appeal with the same force as it would do to those to whom he was writing. The incident taken by itself, indeed, does not contain any suggestion of such a hidden meaning. Yet the history of the Heb nation is but typical of the history of the church in all ages, and the apostle's familiarity with rabbinical modes of interpretation may have led him to adopt this method of confirming the truth which he had already proved from the law itself.

For a discussion of the text and interpretation of Gal 4 25*a*, "Now this Hagar is mount Sinai in Arabia," and an account of Philo's allegory of Hagar and Sarah, see Lightfoot's notes at the end of ch iv in his Comm. on Gal. JAMES CRICHTON

HAGGAI, hag′a-ī, hag′ā̂-i (חַגַּי, ḥaggay, an adj. formed from חַג, ḥagh, "feast"): The word "Haggai" may mean "festal," the prophet having been born perhaps on a festival day; cf the Rom name "Festus." Heb proper names were sometimes formed in this manner, e.g. Barzillai, "a man of iron," from barzel, "iron." Haggai may, however, be a shortened form of Haggiah (1 Ch 6 30), meaning "festival of Jeh," as Mattenai is an abbreviation of Mattaniah (Ezr 10 33.26). In Gr Ἀγγαῖος, Haggaíos, in Lat, Aggaeus or Aggeus, sometimes Haggaeus. Haggai is the 10th in the order of the Twelve Prophets.

1. Name

2. Personal History

Little is really known of his personal history. But we do know that he lived soon after the captivity, being the first of the prophets of the Restoration. From 2 3 of his prophecies it is inferred by many that he had seen the first temple, which, as we know, was destroyed in 586 BC. If so, he must have prophesied when a comparatively old man, for we know the exact date of his prophecies, 520 BC. According to Ezr 5 1; 6 14, he was a contemporary of Zechariah, and was associated with him in the work of rebuilding the temple; besides, in the Gr and Lat and Syr VSS, his name stands with Zechariah's at the head of certain pss, e.g. Ps 111 (112), in the Vulg alone; Pss 125, 126, in the Pesh alone; Ps 137, in the LXX alone; Pss 146, 147, 148, in LXX and Pesh; and Ps 145, in LXX, Pesh and Vulg; perhaps these pss were introduced into the temple-service on their recommendation. He was a prophet of great faith (cf 2 1–5); it is possible that he was a priest also (cf 2 10–19). Like Malachi he bears the name of "Jeh's messenger" (1 13; cf Mal 3 1). According to Jewish tradition, he was a member of the Great Synagogue.

3. Work

Haggai's work was intensely practical and important. Jeh employed him to awaken the conscience and stimulate the enthusiasm of his compatriots in the rebuilding of the temple. "No prophet ever appeared at a more critical juncture in the history of the people, and, it may be added, no prophet was more successful" (Marcus Dods). Zechariah assisted him (cf Hag 1 1; Zec 1 1).

4. Period and Circumstances

Haggai's prophecies, like Ezekiel's, are dated "in the second year of Darius" (1 1; 2 10), i.e. 520 BC. The Jews, 42,360 strong (Ezr 2 64), had returned from Babylon 16 years before (536 BC), under the leadership of Zerubbabel, the civil head of the community, and Joshua, the ecclesiastical. The generous edict of Cyrus had made return possible (cf Ezr 1 1–4). The new colonists had settled in Jerus and in the neighboring towns of Bethlehem, Bethel, Anathoth, Gibeon, Kiriath-jearim, and others adjacent (Ezr 2 20 ff). Eager to reëstablish the public worship of the sanctuary, they set about at once to erect the altar of burnt offering upon its old site (Ezr 3 2.3; cf Hag 2 14). Plans were also made for the immediate rebuilding of the temple, and the foundation stone was actually laid in the 2d month of the 2d year of the return (Ezr 3 8–10), but the work was suddenly interrupted by the jealous, half-caste, semi-pagan Samaritans, descendants of the foreign colonists introduced into Samaria in 722 BC (cf 2 K 17 24–41), whose offer to coöperate had been refused (Ezr 4 1–5.24). For 16 years thereafter nothing was done toward rearing the superstructure (Ezr 4 5.24; 5 16); indeed, the Jews became indifferent, and began to build for themselves "ceiled houses" (Hag 1 4). (W. H. Kosters has attempted to show that there was no return under Cyrus, and that Haggai and Zechariah, who never allude to any return, but rather look upon the return as still in the future [cf Zec 2 6.7], preached to the Jews who remained in Jerus, never having been carried by Nebuchadnezzar into captivity in 586 BC. But this theory is opposed by too many converging lines of Scriptural statement to warrant serious credence.) With the accession of Darius Hystaspes (i.e. Darius, the son of Hystaspes), the tide turned. Darius was a true successor to Cyrus, and favored religious freedom. Through the influence of the prophets Haggai and Zechariah, the people were roused from their lethargy, and the work of rebuilding was resumed with energy in 520 BC (Hag 1 14.15). The foundations were relaid (Hag 2 18). Four years later, in the 6th year of Darius, the whole structure was completed and dedicated (Ezr 6 15). Meanwhile important events were taking place in the Pers empire. On the death of Cambyses in 522 BC, the throne had been seized by a usurper, the so-called Pseudo-Smerdis, who held it, however, for some 7 months only. He was murdered by Darius, and the latter was elevated to the throne. But this gave other ambitious pretenders cause to rebel, and many provinces revolted, among them Susiana, Media, Assyria, Armenia, Parthia, and others (cf the famous Behistun inscription). Altogether Darius fought 19 battles in putting down his rivals, and did not succeed in vanquishing all of his foes till the year after Haggai prophesied. This accounts for the prophet's repeated allusions to Jeh's "shaking" the nations (2 6.7.21.22). Haggai seems to regard the "shaking" of the nations as the precursor of the Messianic age. It was, therefore, important from the prophet's point of view, that Jeh's temple should be made ready for the Messiah's advent, that it might become the religious center of the world (cf Isa 2 2–4). The exact date of Haggai's preaching was from September to December, 520 BC.

5. Analysis

Haggai's prophecies are dated and therefore easily analyzed. They are composed of four distinct discourses, all four being delivered within 4 months' time in the year 520 BC: (1) Ch 1, delivered on the 1st day of the 6th month (September), in which the prophet reproaches the people for their indifference to the work of rebuilding the temple, and warns them to consider their ways; assuring them that their procrastination was not due to want of means (1 4), and that God on account of their apathy was withholding the produce of the field (1 10). The effect of this appeal was that 24 days later, all the people, including Zerubbabel and Joshua, began the work of reconstruction (1 14.15). (2) 2 1–9, delivered on the 21st day of the 7th month (October), which was about one month after the work had been resumed, and containing a note of encouragement to those who felt that the new structure was destined to be so much inferior to Solomon's temple. The prophet, on the contrary, assures them that the latter glory of the new house shall eclipse that of Solomon's magnificent temple, for soon a great "shaking" on Jeh's part among the nations will usher in the Messianic age, and the precious things of all nations will flow in to beautify it (cf He 12 26–28). (3) 2 10–19, delivered on the 24th day of the 9th month (December) which was exactly 3 months after the building had been resumed, and containing, like the first discourse, a rebuke to the people because of their indifference and inertia. The discourse is couched in the form of a parable (vs 11–14), by means of which the prophet explains why the prayers of the people go unanswered. It is because they have so long postponed the completion of the temple; a taint of guilt vitiates everything they do, and blasting and mildew and hail, and consequently unfruitful seasons, are the result. On the other hand, if they will but press forward with the work, Jeh will again bless them, and fruitful seasons will follow their revived zeal (2 19; cf Zec 8 9–12). (4) 2 20–23, delivered on the 24th day of the 9th month, the very same day as that on which the discourse in 2 10–19 was delivered. The sequence is immediate. For when Jeh "shakes" the nations, He will establish Zerubbabel, the representative of the Davidic dynasty and the object of patriotic hopes. When the heathen powers are overthrown, Zerubbabel will stand unshaken as Jeh's honored and trusted vicegerent, and as the precious signet on Jeh's hand (cf Jer 22 24; Cant 8 6).

6. Message

The most striking feature in Haggai's message is its repeated claim of Divine origin: 5 t in the 38 verses of his prophecies, he tells us that "the word of Jeh came" unto him (1 1.3; 2 1.10.20); 4 t, also, he used the formula, "Thus saith Jeh of hosts" (1 2. 5.7; 2 11); 5 t "saith Jeh of hosts" (1 9; 2 6.7. 9.23); and 4 t simply "saith Jeh" (1 13; 2 4.14.17). Altogether he uses the exalted phrase "Jeh of hosts" 14 t, besides 19 repetitions of the single but ineffable name "Jeh." The most striking sentence in all his prophecies is probably that found in 1 13, "Then spake Haggai, Jeh's messenger in Jeh's message unto the people." His single purpose, as we have above seen, was to encourage the building of the temple. This he seems to have regarded as essential to the purity of Israel's religion. His key-exhortation is, "Consider your ways" (1 5 7; cf 2 15.18). His prophecies reflect the conditions of his age. He points to judgments as a proof of the Divine displeasure (1 9.10; 2 15–19). Unlike the earlier prophets, he does not denounce idolatry; but like his contemporary, Zechariah, and his successor, Malachi, he does lay stress on the external side of religion. Chief interest centers in the somewhat unusual parable contained in 2 10–19, which teaches that holiness is not contagious, but that evil is. "The faint aroma of sanctity coming from their altar and sacrifices was too feeble to pervade the secular atmosphere of their life" (A. B. Davidson, Exile and Restoration, 82). Haggai argues that Israel's sacrifices for 16 years had been unclean in God's sight, and had brought them no blessing, because they had left the temple in ruins; and, that while a healthy man cannot give his health to another by touching him, a sick man may easily spread contagion among all those about him. The thought is suggestive. Haggai may or may not have been a priest, "but in so short a prophecy this elaborate allusion to ritual is very significant." Another very striking thought in Haggai's book is his reference to Zerubbabel as Jeh's "servant" and "signet," whom Jeh has "chosen" (2 23). Wellhausen regards these words as an equivalent to making Zerubbabel the Messiah; but it is enough to think that the prophet is attempting only to restore him to the honorable position from which his grandfather, Jehoiachin, in Jer 22 24, had been degraded. Thus would the prophet link Zerubbabel, the political hope of the post-exilic congregation, to the royal line of Judah. Isaiah speaks of Cyrus in similar terms without any Messianic implication (Isa 44 28; 45 1). On the other hand, the implicit Messianic import of 2 7.8 is recognized on all sides.

7. Style

Haggai's style is suited to the contents of his prophecies. While he is less poetical than his predecessors, yet parallelism is not altogether wanting in his sentence (2 8). Compared with the greater books of prophecy, his brief message has been declared "plain and unadorned," "tame and prosaic"; yet it must be acknowledged that he is not wanting in pathos when he reproves, or in force when he exhorts. Though he labors under a poverty of terms, and frequently repeats the same formulae, yet he was profoundly in earnest, and became the most successful in his purpose of all his class. He was esp. fond of interrogation. At best we have only a summary, probably, of what he actually preached.

8. Criticism The critical questions involved in Haggai's case are not serious: 2 5*a*, for example, is wanting in the LXX; to 2 14 the LXX adds from Am 5 10; 2 17 is very similar to, and seems dependent on, Am 4 9; 1 7*b* and 13, are rejected by some as later interpolations; while Klostermann and Marti hold that the book as a whole was not written by Haggai at all, but rather about his prophetic activity, a perfectly gratuitous assumption without any substantial proof in its favor.

HAGGERI, hag′ḗ-rī. See Hagri.

HAGGI, hag′ī (חַגִּי, ḥaggī, "festive"): The second son of Gad (Gen 46 16; Nu 26 15). The latter refers to his descendants as Haggites, of whom nothing else is known.

HAGGIAH, ha-gī′a (חַגִּיָּה, ḥaggīyāh, "feast of Jeh"): Named in 1 Ch 6 30 as among the descendants of Levi.

HAGGITES, hag′īts. See Haggi.

HAGGITH, hag′ith (חַגִּית, ḥaggīth, "festal"): According to 2 S 3 4; 1 K 1 5.11; 2 13; 1 Ch 3 2, the fifth wife of David and the mother of his fourth son, Adonijah. The latter was born in Hebron while David's capital was there (2 S 3 4.5).

HAGIA, hā′gi-a. See Agia.

HAGIOGRAPHA, hag-i-og′ra-fa. See Bible; Canon of OT.

HAGRI, hag′rī (הַגְרִי, haghrī, "wanderer"; AV Haggeri): The father of Mibhar, one of the "mighty men" who rallied round David during his foreign wars. Mentioned only in 1 Ch 11 38, whose ∥ passage, 2 S 23 36, gives, instead, the name "Bani the Gadite."

HAGRITES, hag′rīts (הַגְרִיאִים, haghrī′īm): An Arab tribe, or confederation of tribes (1 Ch 5 10.19.20 AV "Hagarites"; 27 31 AV "Hagerite"; Ps 83 6 "Hagarenes"), against which the Reubenites fought in the days of Saul. In Gen 25 12–18 are recorded the descendants, "generations," of Ishmael, "whom Hagar the Egyp, Sarah's handmaid, bare unto Abraham." Two, and possibly three, of these tribes, Jetur, Naphish and Kedemah (ver 15), appear to be identical with the 3 tribes whom the Reubenites and the other Israelitish tribes E. of the Jordan conquered and dispossessed (1 Ch 5). The correspondence of names in Gen and 1 Ch leaves little doubt that "Hagrite" is a generic term roughly synonymous with "Ishmaelite," designating the irregular and shifting line of desert tribes stretching along the E. and S. of Pal. Those "E. of Gilead," "Jetur, Naphish and Nodah," were overcome by Reuben: "The Hagrites were delivered into their hand, and all that were with them. . . . . And they took away their cattle . . . . they dwelt in their stead until the captivity" (1 Ch 5 20–22). These along with other Arab tribes are mentioned in the inscriptions of Tiglath-pileser III (745–727 BC). Jetur gave his name to the Ituraeans of Rom times, who were famed soldiers dwelling in Anti-Libanus. Cf Curtis, Comm. on Ch; Skinner, "Gen," ICC, in loc.

HAI, hā′ī (הָעַי, hā-‘ay, "the heap"): Gen 12 8; 13 3 AV; RV Ai (which see).

HAIL, hāl (בָּרָד, bārādh; χάλαζα, chálaza): Hail usually falls in the spring or summer during severe thunder storms.

1. Its Occurrence Hailstones are made up of alternate layers of ice and snow, and sometimes reach considerable size, causing great damage by their fall. Upward currents of air carry up raindrops already formed to the colder regions above, where they freeze, and as they again pass through layers of cloud, their bulk increases until, too heavy to be carried by the current, they fall to the ground. Hailstorms, like thunder storms, occur in narrow belts a few miles in breadth and are of short duration. Almost without exception they occur in the daytime. If they take place before the time of harvest they do great damage to grain and fruit, and in extreme cases have injured property and endangered life.

2. In Syria Hailstorms, while by no means common in Syria and Pal, are not unusual and are of great severity. They occasionally take place in Egypt. Within a few years hailstones of unusual size fell in Port Said, breaking thousands of windows.

3. Biblical Instances (1) The plague of hail (Ex 9 23–24; Ps 78 47), which was a local storm, as they usually are, falling on the Egyptians and not striking the children of Israel in Goshen. It was of great severity. "There was hail, and fire mingled with the hail, very grievous, such as had not been in all the land of Egypt since it became a nation" (Ex 9 24). It took place in January, for the barley "was in the ear, and the flax was in bloom" (ver 31), and caused great damage. (2) After the battle with the Amorites at Gibeon, "Jeh cast down great stones from heaven upon them unto Azekah, and they died: they were more who died with the hailstones than they whom the children of Israel slew with the sword" (Josh 10 11).

4. As Punishment Hail is often spoken of as a means of punishing the wicked: "As a tempest of hail . . . . will he cast down" (Isa 28 2); "The hail shall sweep away the refuge of lies" (ver 17); and as symbols of God's anger: "I will rain . . . . great hailstones, fire, and brimstone" (Ezk 38 22); "There shall be . . . . great hailstones in wrath to consume it" (Ezk 13 13; cf Isa 30 30; Hag 2 17; Rev 8 7; 11 19; 16 21).

5. God's Power Jeh's power and wisdom are shown in controlling the hail: "Hast thou seen the treasuries of the hail?" (Job 38 22); "Fire and hail, snow and vapor . . . . fulfilling his word" (Ps 148 8).

Alfred H. Joy

HAIL, hāl: Interjection, found only in the Gospels as the tr of χαῖρε, chaíre, χαίρετε, chaírete, imp. of χαίρω, chaírō, "to rejoice," is used as a greeting or salutation. The word "Hail" is OE and was formerly an adj., used with the vb. to be, meaning "well," "sound," "hale," e.g. "Hale be thou." Wiclif has "heil" without the vb., followed by other Eng. VSS, except that the Geneva has "God save thee," in Mt 26 49; 28 9. The word occurs in Mt 26 49; 27 29; 28 9, "all hail!"; Mk 15 18; Lk 1 28; Jn 19 3. See Godspeed; Greeting.

1. Hair Fashions

HAIR, hâr (שֵׂעָר, sēʽār, שַׂעַר, saʽar, Aram. שְׂעַר, s^eʽar, and their derivatives; θρίξ, thríx, gen. case τριχός, trichós, κόμη, kómē): Hair was worn in different fashions by the Orientals of Bib. times, and not always in the same way among the same people in different epochs. We know this clearly from Egyp lit. and monuments, as well as from the writings of Gr authors (esp. Herodotus), that the dwellers on the Nile had their heads shaved in early youth, leaving but a side lock until maturity was attained, when this mark of childhood was taken away. Priests and warriors kept their heads closely shaved; nothing but the exigencies of arduous warfare were allowed to interfere with this custom. On the other hand, the Heb people, like their Bab neighbors (Herod. i.195), affected long and well-cared-for, bushy curls of hair as emblems of manly beauty. Proofs thereof are not infrequent in the Scriptures and elsewhere. Samson's (Jgs 16 13.19) and Absalom's (2 S 14 26) long luxuriant hair is specially mentioned, and the Shulammite sings of the locks of her beloved which are "bushy [RVm "curling"], and black as a raven" (Cant 5 11). Jos (Ant, VIII, vii, 3 [185]) reports that Solomon's body-guard was distinguished by youthful beauty and "luxuriant heads of hair." In the history of Samson we read of "the seven locks of his head" (Jgs 16 19). It is likely that the expression signifies the plaits of hair which are even now often worn by the young Bedâwin warrior of the desert.

2. Hair in Idol-Worship

It is well known that among the surrounding heathen nations the hair of childhood or youth was often shaved and consecrated at idolatrous shrines (cf Herod. ii.65 for Egypt). Frequently this custom marked an initiatory rite into the service of a divinity (e.g. that of Orotal [Bacchus] in Arabia, Herod. iii.8). It was therefore an abomination of the Gentiles in the eyes of the Jew, which is referred to in Lev 19 27; Jer 9 26; 25 23; 49 32. The Syr version of the latter passage renders, "Ye shall not let your hair grow long" (i.e. in order to cut it as a religious rite in honor of an idol). It is, however, probable that among the Jews, as now among many classes of Mohammedans, the periodical cropping of the hair, when it had become too cumbersome, was connected with some small festivity, when the weight of the hair was ascertained, and its weight in silver was given in charity to the poor. At least, the weighing of Absalom's hair (2 S 14 26) may be referred to some such custom, which is not unparalleled in other countries. The use of balances in connection with the shaving-off of the hair in Ezk 5 1 is certainly out of the common. See illustration, "Votive Offering," on p. 1302.

3. The Nazirite Vow

We may also compare the shaving of the head of the Nazirite to these heathen practices, though the resemblance is merely superficial. The man who made a vow to God was responsible to Him with his whole body and being. Not even a hair was to be injured wilfully during the whole period of the vow, for all belonged to God. The conclusion of the Nazirite vow was marked by sacrifices and the shaving of the head at the door of the sanctuary (Nu 6 1–21), indicative of a new beginning of life. The long untouched hair was therefore considered as the emblem of personal devotion (or devotedness) to the God of all strength. Thus it was an easy step to the thought that in the hair was the seat of strength of a Samson (Jgs 16 17.20). God has numbered the very hairs of the head (Mt 10 30; Lk 12 7), which to human beings conveys the idea of the innumerableness (Ps 40 12; 69 4). What God can number, He can also protect, so that not even a hair of the head might "fall to the earth" or "perish." These phrases express complete safety (1 S 14 45; 2 S 14 11; 1 K 1 52; Lk 21 18; Acts 27 34).

4. Later Fashions

In NT times, esp. in the Diaspora, the Jews frequently adopted the fashion of the Romans in cropping the hair closely (1 Cor 11 14); still the fear of being tainted by the idolatrous practice of the heathen, which is specially forbidden in Lev 21 5, was so great that the side locks remained untouched and were permitted to grow ad libitum. This is still the custom among the Jews of Eastern Europe and the Orient. See also Head.

5. Woman's Hair

If Heb men paid much attention to their hair, it was even more so among Heb women. Long black tresses were the pride of the Jewish maiden and matron (Cant 7 5; Jn 11 2; 1 Cor 11 5.6.15), but many of the expressions used in connection with the "coiffures" of women do not convey to us more than a vague idea. The "locks" of AV in Cant 4 1.3; 6 7; Isa 47 2 (צַמָּה, çēmmāh) probably do not refer to the hair, but should be tr^d (as does RV, which follows the LXX) by "veil." דַּלָּה, dallāh (Cant 7 5), signifies the slender threads which represent the unfinished web in the loom (cf Isa 38 12), and thence the flowing hair of women (RV "hair"). רְהָטִים, r^ehāṭīm (RV "tresses"), in the same ver of the Song of Songs means lit. the "gutters" at which the flocks were watered (cf Gen 30 38.41), and thus the long plaits of the maiden with which the lover toys and in which he is held captive. The braiding or dressing of woman's hair is expressed in 2 K 9 30 and Jth 10 3. In NT times Christian women are warned against following the fashionable world in elaborate hairdressing (1 Tim 2 9; 1 Pet 3 3).

6. Barbers

The care of the hair, esp. the periodical cutting of the same, early necessitated the trade of the barber. The Heb word גַּלָּב, gallābh, is found in Ezk 5 1, and the pl. form of the same word occurs in an inscription at Citium (Cyprus) (CIS, 1586), where the persons thus described clearly belonged to the priests or servants of a temple. See Barber.

7. Ointments

Numerous were the cosmetics and ointments applied to the hair (Eccl 9 8; Mt 6 17; perhaps Ruth 3 3), but some, reserved for sacramental purposes, were prohibited for profane use (Ex 30 32; Ps 133 2). Such distinction we find also in Egypt, where the walls of temple laboratories were inscribed with extensive recipes of such holy oils, while the medical papyri (see esp. Papyrus Ebers, plates 64–67) contain numerous ointments for the hair, the composition of some of which is ascribed to a renowned queen of antiquity. Even Gr and Rom medical authors have transmitted to us the knowledge of some such prescriptions compounded, it is said, by Queen Cleopatra VI of Egypt, the frivolous friend of Caesar and Antony (see my dissertation, Die über die medicinischen Kenntnisse der alten Aegypter berichtenden Papyri, etc, Leipzig, 1888, 121–32). We know from Jos (Ant, XVI, viii, 1 [233]), that Herod the Great, in his old age, dyed his hair black, a custom, however, which does not appear to be specifically Jewish, as hair-dyes as well as means for bleaching the hair were well known in Greece and Rome. It is certain that the passage Mt 5 36 would not have been spoken, had this been a common custom in the days of the Lord. A special luxury is mentioned by Jos (Ant, VIII, vii, 3 [185]), who states that the young men who formed the body-guard of King Solomon were in the habit, on festive occasions, of sprinkling their long hair with gold-dust (ψῆγμα χρυσοῦ, psēgma chrusoú).

Modern Jew of Jericho with Long Side Locks.

For the Jews the anointing of the head was synonymous with joy and prosperity (cf Ps 23 5; 92 10; He 1 9; cf also "oil of joy," Isa 61 3, and "oil of gladness," Ps 45 7). It was also, like the washing of feet, a token of hospitality (Ps 23 5; Lk 7 46).

On the contrary, it was the custom in times of personal or national affliction and mourning to wear the hair unanointed and disheveled, or to cover the head with dust and ashes (2 S 14 2; Josh 7 6; Job 2 12), or to tear the hair or to cut it off (Ezr 9 3; Neh 13 25; Jer 7 29).

8. Symbolical Use of Word

We have referred to the thickness of hair which supplied the Heb with a suitable expression for the conception "innumerable." Hair is also expressive of minuteness; thus the 700 left-handed men of Benjamin were able to "sling stones at a hairbreadth, and not miss" (Jgs 20 16). Gray hairs and the hoary white of old age were highly honored by the Jews (Prov 16 31; 20 29; 2 Macc 6 23). Besides expressing old age (Isa 46 4), they stand for wisdom (Wisd 4 9 [10]). Sometimes white hair is the emblem of a glorious, if not Divine, presence (Dnl 7 9; 2 Macc 15 13; Rev 1 14). Calamity befalling the gray-headed was doubly terrible (Gen 42 38; 44 29). The "hair of the flesh" is said to "stand up" (Job 4 15; Sir 27 14) when sudden terror or fear takes hold of a person. The symbolical language of Isa 7 20 uses the "hair of the feet" (see Feet) and "the beard" as synonymous with "the humble" and the "mighty of the people."

Camel's hair (Mt 3 4; Mk 1 6) is mentioned in connection with the description of John the Baptist's raiment. It represents, according to Jerome, a rough shirt worn under the coat or wrapper, though a rather soft fabric is produced in Arabia from the finer wool of the camel.

Goat's hair was the material of a cloth used for wearing apparel and for a more or less waterproof covering of tents and bundles. It is the 'black tent-cloth of Kedar' (Cant 1 5; Ex 26 7; 36 14). In NT times it was the special product of St. Paul's native province, Cilicia, whence its name cilicium, and its manufacture formed the apostle's own trade (Acts 18 3). It is also mentioned as a material for stuffing pillows (1 S 19 13). See also Weaving.

HAIR, PLUCKING OF THE. See Punishments.

HA-JEHUDIJAH, ha-jĕ-hū-dī′ja (הַיְהֻדִיָּה, ha-yehudhīyāh): Named in the genealogical list (1 Ch 4 18). Possibly a proper name (RVm), but probably "the Jewess" (RV). May be so given in order to distinguish from the Egyp named in this verse. AV translates "Jehudijah."

HAKKATAN, hak′a-tan (הַקָּטָן, ha-ḳāṭān, "the little one"): The father of Johanan, who returned with Ezra to Jerus (Ezr 8 12=Akatan, 1 Esd 8 38).

HAKKOZ, hak′oz (הַקּוֹץ, haḳḳōç, or ha-ḳōç, "the nimble"):

(1) A priest and chief of the 7th course of Aaron's sons selected by David (1 Ch 24 10). According to Ezr 2 61; Neh 3 4.21; 7 63, his descendants returned with Zerubbabel from the captivity. But AV considers the name in Ezr and Neh as having the art. prefixed, hence renders "Koz."

(2) One of Judah's descendants (1 Ch 4 8).

HAKUPHA, ha-kū′fa (חֲקוּפָא, ḥăḳūphā', "incitement"). A family name of some of the Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ezr 2 51; Neh 7 53).

HALAH, hā′la (חֲלַח, ḥălaḥ; Ἁλάε, Haláe, Ἁλλάε, Halláe, Χαάχ, Chaách, for Χαλάχ, Chalách, Χαλά, Chalá; Vulg Hala): Mentioned in 2 K 17 6; 18 11; 1 Ch 5 26, as one of the places to which the kings of Assyria sent the exiled Israelites (see Gozan; Habor). Various identifications have been proposed, all of them except the last more or less improbable for philological reasons: (1) the Assyr Kalaḫ (Nimrūd, the Calah of Gen 10 11); (2) the Assyr Ḫilakku (Cilicia);

2. The Most Probable of Them

(3) Chalkitis in Mesopotamia (Ptol. v.18, 4), adjoining Gauzanitis (Gozan)—a good position otherwise; (4) the Calachene of Strabo, in the N. of Assyria. Equally unsuitable, also, is (5) the Chalonitis of Pliny and Strabo, N.E. of Assyria, notwithstanding that this was apparently called Halah by the Syrians. An attractive identification was (6) with the river Balīkh (by change of H into B)—cf LXX "in Halae and in Habor, rivers of Gozan"—but even this has to be abandoned in favor of (7) the Assyr Ḫalaḫḫu, which (except the doubling and the case-ending) is the same, letter for letter. It is mentioned in the W. Asia Inscr, II, pl. 53, l. 35, between Arrapḫa (Arrapachitis) and Raṣappu (Reseph). According to the tablet K. 123, where it is called mat Ḫalaḫḫi, "the land of Ḫalaḫḫu," it apparently included the towns Še-bisê, Še-îrriši, Lu-ammu[ti ?], and Še-Akkulani, apparently four grain-producing centers for the Assyr government. The first quotation implies that Halah was near or in Gauzanitis, and had a chief town of the same name. Of the 8 personal names in K. 123, 5 are Assyr, the remainder being Syrian rather than Israelitish.

HALAK, hā'lak, MOUNT (הָהָר הֶחָלָק, hā-hār he-ḥālāḳ): A mountain that marked the southern limit of the conquests of Joshua (Josh 11 17; 12 7). It is spoken of as the "mount Halak [lit. "the bare" or "smooth mountain"] that goeth up to Seir." The latter passage locates it on the W. of the Arabah. The southern boundary of the land is defined by the ascent of Akrabbim (Nu 34 4; Josh 15 3). This may with some certainty be identified with the pass known today as naḳb eṣ-Ṣafā, "pass of the smooth rock," through which runs the road from the S. to Hebron. To the S.W. opens Wādy Maderah, a continuation of Wādy el-Fiḳrah, in which there rises a conspicuous hill, Jebel Maderah, composed of limestone, answering well the description of a bare or smooth mountain. It is a striking feature of the landscape viewed from all sides, and may well be the mount here referred to. See also Hor, Mount.

HALAKHA, ha-lä'ka. See Talmud.

HALE, hāl, vb., HALING, hāl'ing (OE halen): "To pull" or "drag," the AV tr of σύρω, súrō, "to draw or drag" (Acts 8 3, "haling men and women," ARV "dragging"), and of κατασύρω, katasúrō, "to drag down" or "force along" (Lk 12 58, "lest he hale thee to the judge," ARV "lest haply he drag thee unto the judge"). A more frequent modern form is "haul."

HALF, häf. See Number.

HALHUL, hal'hul (חַלְחוּל, ḥalḥūl): A city in the hill country of Judah (Josh 15 58), "Halhul, Beth-zur and Gedor." It is without doubt the modern Ḥalḥūl, a village on a hill, surrounded by fine fields and vineyards, some 4 miles N. of Hebron and less than a mile to the E. of the modern carriage road. It is conspicuous from a considerable distance on account of its ancient mosque, Wely Nebi Yûnas, the "shrine of the Prophet Jonah"—a tradition going back at least to the 14th cent. The mosque, which has a minaret or tower, is built upon a rock platform artificially leveled. In the 14th cent. it was stated by Isaac Chilo (a Jewish pilgrim) that the tomb of Gad the Seer (1 S 22 5; 2 S 24 11 f) was situated in this town. Beth-zur (Beit Ṣûr) and Gedor (Jedûr) are both near. In Jos (BJ, IV, ix, 6) we read of an Alurus (where the Idumaeans assembled), and in Jerome (OS 119 7) of a village Alula near Hebron, which both probably refer to the same place (PEF, III, 305; Sh XXI).

HALI, hā'lī (חֲלִי, ḥălī): A town named with Helkath, Beten and Achshaph on the border of Asher (Josh 19 25). No certain identification is possible; but it may be represented by the modern Khirbet 'Alia, c 13 miles N.E. of Acre.

HALICARNASSUS, hal-i-kär-nas'us (Ἁλικαρνασσός, Halikarnassós): The largest and strongest city of the ancient country of Caria in Asia Minor, situated on the shore of a bay, 15 miles from the island of Cos. Its site was beautiful; its climate temperate and even; the soil of the surrounding country was unusually fertile and noted for its abundance of fig, orange, lemon, olive and almond trees. When the ancient country fell into the possession of the Persians, the kings of Caria were still permitted to rule. One of the rulers was the famous queen Artemisia who fought at the battle of Salamis. The most famous of the kings, however, was Maussollos (Mausōlus), who ruled from 373 to 353 BC, and the tomb in which he was buried was long considered one of the wonders of the ancient world. Pliny describes the tomb as a circular structure, 140 ft. high, 411 ft. in circumference, and surrounded by 36 columns; it was covered with a pyramidal dome. The ancient writer Vitruvius, in his description of the city, says that the agora was along the shore; back of it was the mausoleum, and still farther away was the temple of Mars. To the right of the agora were the temples of Venus and Mercury, and to the left was the palace of Maussollos. Alexander the Great destroyed the city only after a long siege, but he was unable to take the acropolis. The city never quite recovered, yet it was later distinguished as the supposed birthplace of Herodotus and Dionysius. That a number of Jews lived there is evident from the fact, according to 1 Macc 15 23, that in the year 139 BC, a letter was written by the Rom Senate in their behalf. In the 1st cent. BC, a decree was issued granting to the Jews in Halicarnassus liberty to worship "according to the Jewish laws, and to make their proseuchē at the sea-side, according to the customs of their forefathers" (Jos, Ant, XIV, x, 23).

The modern town of Budrun, which represents the ancient Halicarnassus and covers a part of its site, stands a little to the W. of the castle of St. Peter. This castle was erected by the Knights of Rhodes in 1404 AD, partly from the ruins of the mausoleum. Lord Redcliffe, who explored the ruins in 1846, sent many of the sculptured slabs from the castle to the British Museum where they may now be seen. Sir C. Newton conducted excavations there in 1857–58, adding other sculptures to the collection in the British Museum. He discovered the foundation of the Ionic temple of Aphrodite, and the greenstone foundation of the mausoleum upon which modern Turkish houses had been built. He also opened several tombs which were outside the ancient city. The city walls, built by Maussollos about 360 BC, and defining the borders of the ancient city, are still preserved; but the ancient harbor which was protected by a mole, has now disappeared. The ruins may best be reached by boat from the island of Cos.

HALL, hôl (Lk 22 55 AV). See House.

HALL, JUDGMENT. See Judgment Hall; Praetorium.

HALLEL, ha-lāl', hal'el: In the fifth book of the Pss (107–50) there are several groups of Hallelujah Psalms: 104–6; 111–13; 115–17; 135; 146–50. In the worship of the synagogue Pss 135–136 and 146–50 were used in the daily morning service. Pss 113–18 were called the "Egyp Hallel," and were sung at the feasts of the Passover, Pentecost, Tabernacles and Dedication. At the Passover, Pss 113 and 114 (according to the school of Shammai only Ps 113) were sung before the feast, and Pss 115–18 after drinking the last cup. The song used by Our Lord and the disciples on the night of the betrayal (Mt 26 30), just before the departure for the Mount of Olives, probably included Pss 115–18. JOHN RICHARD SAMPEY

HALLELUJAH, hal-ĕ-lōō'ya (הַלְלוּ־יָהּ, halᵉ-lū-yāh, "praise ye Jeh"; ἀλληλουιά, allēlouiá): The word is not a compound, like many of the Heb words which are composed of the abbreviated form of "Jehovah" and some other word, but has become a compound word in the Gr and other languages. Even if the Jews perhaps had become accustomed to use it as a compound, it is never written as such in the text. In some Pss, H. is an integral part of the song (Ps 135 3), while in others it simply serves as a liturgical interjection found either at the beginning (Ps 111) or at the close (Ps 104) of the psalms or both (Ps 146). The H. Pss are found in three groups: 104–6; 111–13; 146–50. In the first group H. is found at the close of the psalm as a lit. interjection (106 1 is an integral part of the psalm). In the second group H. is found at the beginning (113 9 is an integral part of the psalm depending on the adj. "joyful"). In the third group H. is found both at the close and at the beginning of the psalms. In all other cases (Pss 115, 116, 117) H. seems to be an integral part of the psalms. These three groups were probably taken from an older collection of psalms like the group Pss 120–34. In the NT H. is found as part of the song of the heavenly host (Rev 19 1 ff). The word is preserved as a liturgical interjection by the Christian church generally. A. L. BRESLICH

HALLOHESH, ha-lō'hesh (הַלּוֹחֵשׁ, ha-lōḥēsh, "the whisperer," "the slanderer"): A post-exilic chief whose son Shallum assisted in repairing the walls of Jerus (Neh 3 12, AV "Halohesh"). He was also one of the leaders who signed the national covenant (10 24 [Heb 25]).

HALLOW, hal'ō, HALLOWED, hal'ōd, hal'ō-ed ("to render or treat as holy," AS hālgian, from hālig, "holy"): It translates several forms of קָדַשׁ, ḳādhash, "set apart," "devote," "consecrate," frequently rendered in AV, RV, ARV "consecrate," "dedicate," "holy," and esp. "sanctify," closely synonymous, "hallow" perhaps containing more of the thought of reverence, sacredness, holiness. It embraces the idea of marked separateness. It is applied to persons, as the priest (Lev 22 2.3); to places or buildings, as the middle of the temple court (1 K 8 64); the tabernacle (Ex 40 9); to things, like the portion of the sacrifice set apart for the priests (Nu 18 8); to times and seasons, as the Sabbath (Jer 17 22; Ezk 20 20) and the Jubilee year (Lev 25 10); to God Himself (Lev 22 32). Its underlying idea of the separateness of holy nature or holy use works out into several often overlapping senses: (1) To set apart, dedicate, offer, reserve, for the worship or service of God: Ex 28 38, "The holy things, which the children of Israel shall hallow in all their holy gifts"; also Lev 22 3; Nu 18 29, etc; 2 K 12 4, "All the money of the hallowed things" (AV "dedicated"), etc. (2) To make holy, by selecting, setting apart, claiming, or acknowledging as His own: Gen 2 3, "God blessed the seventh day, and hallowed it" (AV "sanctified"); but Ex 20 11 (AV, ERV, ARV), "hallowed." So of the temple (1 K 9 7); of the firstborn, spared in Egypt (Nu 3 13). (3) To dedicate or consecrate by formal ceremonial, with the accompanying idea of cleansing from sin and uncleanness: Ex 29 1, "This is the thing that thou shalt do unto them [Aaron and his sons] to hallow them, to minister unto me in the priest's office." The whole chapter is devoted to the elaborate ceremonial, consisting of ablutions, enduement in priestly robes and paraphernalia, anointing with oil, the offering of a bullock for a sin offering, and of a ram, the placing of the blood of another ram upon the right ear, right thumb, right great toe of each, the wave offering, the anointing of the holy garments, and the eating of the consecrated food, all this lasting seven days, and indicating the completeness with which they were set apart, the deep necessity of purification, and the solemnity and sacredness of the office. The tabernacle and its furniture were similarly "hallowed" by a simpler ceremony, using the anointing oil. (4) To render ritually fit for religious service, worship, or use: Lev 16 19, "Hallow it [the altar with the sprinkled blood] from the uncleannesses of the children of Israel"; Nu 6 11, "The priest shall . . . . make atonement for him, for that he sinned by reason of the dead, and shall hallow his head that same day." (5) To hold sacred, reverence, keep holy: Jer 17 22, "But hallow ye the Sabbath day," by keeping it distinct and separate, esp. (Jer 17 24.27) by refraining from unnecessary work, from burden-bearing, travel, or traffic (Neh 13 16). See Ex 20 8–11 (the Sabbath Commandment). (6) To revere, hold in awe, and reverence as holy and "separated from sinners" in majesty, power, sacredness: Lev 22 32, "And ye shall not profane my holy name; but I will be hallowed among the children of Israel." Ḳādhash is elsewhere trᵈ "sanctify" in this connection, meaning "to be manifested in awe-producing majesty, power, or grace": Ezk 38 23, "And I will . . . . sanctify myself, and I will make myself known in the eyes of many nations; and they shall know that I am Jeh"; cf Ezk 28 22.23, etc.

In the NT "hallow" occurs only in the "Lord's Prayer," there rendering ἁγιάζω, hagiázō, the LXX word for ḳādhash: Mt 6 9; Lk 11 2, "Hallowed be thy name." Hagiazō is quite frequent in the NT, and is always (ARV) rendered "sanctify," except here, and in Rev 22 11, "He that is holy, let him be made holy still." To "hallow the name" includes not only the inward attitude and outward action of profound reverence and active praise, but also that personal godliness, loving obedience and aggressive Christlikeness, which reveal the presence of God in the life, which is His true earthly glory.
PHILIP WENDELL CRANNELL

HALT, hôlt (צָלַע, çālaʻ, "to limp"; χωλός, chōlós, "lame," "crippled"): ARV in Gen 32 31 prefers "limped"; in Mic 4 6.7; Zeph 3 19, "is [or was] lame"; in Lk 14 21, ARV and ERV have "lame." In 1 K 18 21 a different word (pāṣaḥ) is used in EV of moral indecision: "How long halt ye between two opinions?" ARV renders, "How long go ye limping between the two sides?"

HAM, ham (חָם, ḥām; Χάμ, Chám):

1. The Youngest Son of Noah

The youngest son of Noah, from whom sprang the western and southwestern nations known to the Hebrews. His name first occurs in Gen 5 32, where, as in 6 10 and elsewhere, it occupies the second place. In Gen 9 18 Ham is described as "the father of Canaan," to prepare the reader for vs 25–27, where Noah, cursing Ham for having told Shem and Japheth of his nakedness, refers to him as Canaan. On account of this, it has been suggested that "Canaan" stood originally in all the passages where the three brothers are spoken of, and that this was later changed to "Ham," except in the verses containing the curse. It seems more likely, however, that the name "Canaan" is inserted prophetically, as Noah would not desire to curse his son, but only one branch of that son's descendants, who were later the principal adversaries of the Hebrews.

2. Ham as a Nationality

The name given, in Ps 105 23.27; 106 22 (cf 78 51), to Egypt as a descendant of Ham, son of Noah. As Shem means "dusky," or the like, and Japheth "fair," it has been supposed that Ham meant, as is not improbable, "black." This is supported by the evidence of Heb and Arab., in which the word ḥāmam means "to be hot" and "to be black," the latter signification being derived from the former.

3. Meaning of the Word

That Ham is connected with the native name of Egypt, Kem, or, in full pa ta' en Kem, "the land of Egypt," in Bashmurian Coptic Kheme, is unlikely, as this form is probably of a much later date than the composition of Gen, and, moreover, as the Arab. shows, the guttural is not a true kh, but the hard breathing h, which are both represented by the Heb ḥēth.

4. The Nations Descending from Ham

Of the nationalities regarded as descending from Ham, none can be described as really black. First on the list, as being the darkest, is Cush or Ethiopia (Gen 10 6), after which comes Miçrayim, or Egypt, then Puṭ or Libyia, and Canaan last. The sons or descendants of each of these are then taken in turn, and it is noteworthy that some of them, like the Ethiopians and the Canaanites, spoke Sem, and not Hamitic, languages—Seba (if connected with the Sabaeans), Havilah (Yemen), and Sheba, whose queen visited Solomon. Professor Sayce, moreover, has pointed out that Caphtor is the original home of the Phoenicians, who spoke a Sem language. The explanation of this probably is that other tongues were forced upon these nationalities in consequence of their migrations, or because they fell under the dominion of nationalities alien to them. The non-Sem Babylonians, described as descendants of Nimrod (Merodach), as is well known, spoke Sumerian, and adopted Sem Bab only on account of mingling with the Semites whom they found there. Another explanation is that the nationalities described as Hamitic—a parallel to those of the Sem section—were so called because they fell under Egyp dominion. This would make the original Hamitic race to have been Egyp, and account for Ham as a (poetical) designation of that nationality. Professor F. L. Griffith has pointed out that the Egyp Priapic god of Panopolis (Akhmim), sometimes called Menu, but also apparently known as Khem, may have been identified with the ancestor of the Hamitic race—he was worshipped from the coast of the Red Sea to Coptos, and must have been well known to Egypt's eastern neighbors. He regards the characteristics of Menu as being in accord with the shamelessness of Ham as recorded in Gen 9 20 ff. See JAPHETH; SHEM; TABLE OF NATIONS.

HAM (הָם, hām):

(1) A place E. of the Jordan named between Ashteroth-karnaim and Shaveh-kiriathaim, in which Chedorlaomer smote the Zu-zim (Gen 14 5). No name resembling this has been recovered. LXX reads bāhem, "with them," instead of b^{e}hām, "in Ham." Some have thought that "Ham" may be a corruption from "Ammon"; or that it may be the ancient name of Rabbath-ammon itself.

(2) A poetical appellation of Egypt: "the land of Ham" (Ps 105 23, etc) is the land of Jacob's sojourning, i.e. Egypt; "the tents of Ham" (Ps 78 51) are the dwellings of the Egyptians. It may be derived from the native name of Egypt, Kēmi, or Khēmi. See MIZRAIM; SHEM.

HAMAN, hā'man (הָמָן, hāmān; Ἁμάν, Hamán): A Pers noble and vizier of the empire under Xerxes. He was the enemy of Mordecai, the cousin of Esther. Mordecai, being a Jew, was unable to prostrate himself before the great official and to render to him the adoration which was due to him in accordance with Pers custom. Haman's wrath was so inflamed that one man's life seemed too mean a sacrifice, and he resolved that Mordecai's nation should perish with him. This was the cause of Haman's downfall and death. A ridiculous notion, which, though widely accepted, has no better foundation than a rabbinic suggestion or guess, represents him as a descendant of Agag, the king of Amalek, who was slain by Samuel. But the language of Scripture (1 S 15 33) indicates that when Agag fell, he was the last of his house. Besides, why should his descendants, if any existed, be called Agagites and not Amalekites? Saul's posterity are in no case termed Saulites, but Benjamites or Israelites. But the basis of this theory has been swept away by recent discovery. Agag was a territory adjacent to that of Media. In an inscription found at Khorsabad, Sargon, the father of Sennacherib, says: "Thirty-four districts of Media I conquered and I added them to the domain of Assyria: I imposed upon them an annual tribute of horses. The country of Agazi [Agag] . . . . I ravaged, I wasted, I burned." It may be added that the name of Haman is not Heb, neither is that of Hammedatha his father. "The name of Haman," writes M. Oppert, the distinguished Assyriologist, "as well as that of his father, belongs to the Medo-Persian."

JOHN URQUHART

HAMATH, hā'math (חֲמָת, ḥămāth; Ἡμάθ, Hēmáth, Αἱμάθ, Haimáth; Swete also has Hemath): The word signifies a defence or citadel, and such designation was very suitable for this chief royal city of the Hittites, situated between their northern and southern capitals, Carchemish and Kadesh, on a gigantic mound beside the Orontes. In Am 6 2 it is named Great Hamath, but not necessarily to distinguish it from other places of the same name.

1. Early History

The Hamathite is mentioned in Gen 10 18 among the sons of Canaan, but in historic times the population, as the personal names testify, seems to have been for the most part Sem. The ideal boundary of Israel reached the territory, but not the city of Hamath (Nu 34 8; Josh 13 5; Ezk 47 13–21). David entered into friendly relations with Toi, its king (2 S 8 9 ff), and Solomon erected store cities in the land of Hamath (2 Ch 8 4). In the days of Ahab we meet with it on the cuneiform inscriptions, under the name mat hamatti, and its king Irhuleni was a party to the alliance of the Hittites with Ben-hadad of Damascus and Ahab of Israel against Shalmaneser II; but this was broken up by the battle of Qarqar in 854 BC, and Hamath became subject to Assyria. Jeroboam II attacked, partially destroyed, and held it for a short time (2 K 14 28; Am 6 2). In 730 BC, its king Eni-ilu paid tribute to Tiglath-pileser, but he divided its lands among his generals, and transported 1,223 of its inhabitants to Sura on the Tigris. In 720, Sargon "rooted out the land of Hamath and dyed the skin of Ilubi'idi [or Jau-bi'idi] its king, like wool," and colonized the country with 4,300 Assyrians, among whom was Deioces the Mede. A few years later Sennacherib also claims to have taken it (2 K 18 34; 19 13; 1 Ch 36 19; 37 13). In Isa 11 11, mention is made of Israelites in captivity at Hamath, and Hamathites were among the colonists settled in Samaria (2 K 17 24) by Esarhaddon in 675 BC. Their special object of worship was Ashima, which, notwithstanding various conjectures, has not been identified.

2. Later History

The Hamathite country is mentioned in 1 Macc 12 25 in connection with the movements of Demetrius and Jonathan. The Seleucidae renamed it Epiphaneia (Jos, Ant, I, vi, 2), and by this name it was known to the Greeks and the Romans, even appearing as Paphunya in Midr Bᵉr Rab ch 37. Locally, however, the ancient name never disappeared, and since the Moslem conquest it has been known as Hama. Saladin's family ruled it for a century and a half, but after the death of Abul-fida in 1331 it sank into decay.

3. Modern Condition

The position of Hama in a fruitful plain to the E. of the Nusairiyeh Mountains, on the most frequented highway between Mesopotamia and Egypt, and on the new railway, gives it again, as in ancient times, a singular significance, and it is once more rising in importance. The modern town is built in four quarters around the ancient citadel-mound, and it has a population of at least 80,000. It is now noted for its gigantic irrigating wheels. Here, too, the Hittite inscriptions were first found and designated Hamathite.

4. Entering in of Hamath

In connection with the northern boundary of Israel, "the entering in of Hamath" is frequently mentioned (Nu 13 21; 1 K 8 65, etc, ARV "entrance"). It has been sought in the Orontes valley, between Antioch and Seleucia, and also at Wādy Nahr el-Bārid, leading down from Homs to the Mediterranean to the N. of Tripoli. But from the point of view of Pal, it must mean some part of the great valley of Coele-Syria (Biqa'a). It seems that instead of translating, we should read here a place-name—"Libo of Hamath"—and the presence of the ancient site of Libo (mod. Leboué) 14 miles N.N.E. of Baalbek, at the head-waters of the Orontes, commanding the strategical point where the plain broadens out to the N. and to the S., confirms us in this conjecture.

W. M. Christie

HAMATH-ZOBAH, hā'math-zō'ba (חֲמַת צוֹבָה, ḥămath çōbhāh; Βαισωβά, Baisōbá): Mentioned only in 2 Ch 8 3. Apart from Great Hamath no site answering to this name is known. It does not seem to be implied that Solomon took possession of Hamath itself, but rather that he "confirmed" his dominion over parts of the kingdom of Zobah, which on its fall may have been annexed by Hamath. LXX cod. B suggests a reading—Beth-zobah—omitting all reference to Hamath. On the other hand, the geographical distinctions between Zobah and Hamath having passed away long before Ch was written, the double name may have been used to indicate generally the extent of Solomon's conquests, as also to avoid confusion with the Zobah in the Hauran (2 S 23 36).

W. M. Christie

HAMMATH, ham'ath (חַמַּת, ḥammāth, "hot spring"):

(1) "The father of the house of Rechab" (1 Ch 2 55).

(2) One of the fenced cities of Naphtali, named with Zer, Rakkath and Chinnereth (Josh 19 35). It is doubtless identical with Emmaus mentioned by Jos (Ant, XVIII, ii, 3; BJ, IV, i, 3) as near Tiberias, on the shore of the lake of Gennesareth. It is represented by the modern el-Ḥammām, nearly 2 miles S. of Tiberias. It was, of course, much nearer the ancient Tiberias, which lay S. of the present city. The hot baths here, "useful for healing," in the time of Jos, have maintained their reputation. In recent years, indeed, there has been a marked increase in the number of sick persons from all parts who visit the baths. The waters are esteemed specially valuable for rheumatism and skin troubles. In the large public bath the water has a temperature of over 140° Fahr. Parts of the ancient fortification still cling to the mountain side above the baths; and the remains of an aqueduct which brought fresh water from sources in the S.W. may be traced along the face of the slopes. Hammath is identical with Hammon (1 Ch 6 76); and probably also with Hammoth-dor (Josh 21 32).

W. Ewing

HAMMEAH, ha-mē'a, ḥam'ḗ-a, THE TOWER OF (הַמֵּאָה, ha-mē'āh [Neh 3 1]; AV Meah): The origin of the name is obscure; in m the meaning is given "Tower of the hundred"; it has been suggested that it may have been 100 cubits high or had 100 steps. It was the most important point on the walls of Jerus in going W. from the Sheep Gate, and is mentioned along with the T. of Hananel (q.v.) (Neh 3 1), and was therefore near the N.E. corner, and probably stood where the Baris and Antonia afterward were, near the N.W. corner of the ḥaram where are today the Turkish barracks. See Jerusalem.

E. W. G. Masterman

HAMMEDATHA, ham-ḗ-dā'tha (הַמְּדָתָא, hammᵉdhāthā'): The father of Haman (Est 3 1). He is generally termed the "Agagite"; the name is of Pers etymology, signifying "given by the moon."

HAMMELECH, ham'ḗ-lek (הַמֶּלֶךְ, ha-melekh, "the king"): Wrongly trᵈ as a proper name in AV. It should be rendered "the king," as in ARV (Jer 36 26; 38 6).

HAMMER, ham'ẽr: The Heb מַקֶּבֶת, maḳḳebheth, occurs in Jgs 4 21, where it refers to the mallet (probably wooden) used to drive tent-pins into the ground. The same word occurs in 1 K 6 7; Isa 44 12; Jer 10 4 as applied to a workman's hammer. פַּטִּישׁ, paṭṭīsh (cf Arab. faṭīs), occurs in Isa 41 7; Jer 23 29; 50 23. It was probably a blacksmith's hammer or heavy hammer used for breaking rock. There is doubt about the rendering of Jgs 5 26, where the word, הַלְמוּת, halmūth, occurs. From the context, the instrument mentioned was probably not a hammer. In Ps 74 6, כֵּילָף, kēlāph, is better trᵈ "axes," not "hammers." See Tools.

James A. Patch

HAMMIPHKAD, ha-mif'kad, GATE OF (שַׁעַר הַמִּפְקָד, sha'ar ha-miphḳādh, "Gate of the Muster"): One of the gates of Jerus (Neh 3 31) not mentioned elsewhere; probably situated near the N.E. corner of the Temple area.

HAMMOLECHETH, ha-mol'ḗ-keth (הַמֹּלֶכֶת, ha-mōlekheth, "the queen"; LXX Μαλέχεθ, Malécheth; AV Hammoleketh): The daughter of Machir and sister of Gilead (1 Ch 7 18).

HAMMON, ham'on (חַמּוֹן, ḥammōn, "glowing"):

(1) A place on the seaward frontier of Asher, named with Rehob and Kanah (Josh 19 28), to be sought, therefore, not far from Tyre. The most probable identification so far suggested is with Umm el'Amūd, "mother of the column" (or 'Awāmīd, "columns"), at the mouth of Wādy Ḥāmūl, on the shore, about 10 miles S. of Tyre. An inscription found by Renan shows that the place was associated with the worship of Ba‘al Ḥammān (CIS, I, 8).

(2) A city in Naphtali, given to the Gershonite Levites (1 Ch 6 76). It is identical with Hammath (Josh 19 35), and probably also with Hammoth-dor (Josh 21 32). W. Ewing

HAMMOTH-DOR, ham-oth-dôr′ (חַמֹּת דֹּאר, ḥammōth dō’r; ’Εμαθδώρ, Emathdŏr, as also several corrupt forms): A fenced, Levitical city of Naphtali (Josh 19 35; 21 32); also named Hammon (1 Ch 6 61 Heb). Probably the hammatu of the Karnak lists, and the hamatam of WAI, II, 53; certainly the Emmaus of Jos, Ant, XVIII, ii, 3; BJ, IV, i, 3; Hamata of ‘Erūbhīn v. 5; Mᵉghillāh 2b*, and the modern el-Hammām, 1½ miles S. of Tiberias. The name signifies “hot springs,” and these, 4 in number, still exist. They have a temperature of 144° F., are salt and bitter in taste and sulphurous in smell. Considered invaluable for rheumatism, they are crowded in June and July. This health-giving reputation is of ancient date. It is mentioned in Jos, BJ, IV, i, 3; and a coin of Tiberias of the reign of Trajan depicts Hygeia sitting on a rock beside the springs, feeding the serpent of Aesculapius. Being used for pleasure also, they were permitted to the Jew on the Sabbath, whereas had they been used only medicinally, they would have been forbidden (Talm Bab, Shab 109a;* cf Mt 12 10). W. M. Christie

HAMMUEL, ham′ū-el (חַמּוּאֵל, ḥammū’ēl, “wrath of God”): A son of Mishma, a Simeonite, of the family of Shaul (1 Ch 4 26).

The name of the celebrated warrior, builder and lawgiver, who ruled over Babylonia about 2000 BC.

1. Etymology of His Name with Reference to Amraphel. His Dynasty

In accordance with the suggestion of the late Professor Eb. Schrader, he is almost universally identified with the Amraphel of Gen 14 1, etc (q.v.). Ḫammurabi was apparently not of Bab origin, the so-called “Dynasty of Babylon,” to which he belonged, having probably come from the W. The commonest form of the name is as above, but Ḫamu(^{m})-rabi (with mimmation) is also found. The reading with initial b in the second element is confirmed by the Bab rendering of the name as Kîmta-rapaštu^{m}, “my family is widespread,” or the like, showing that rabi was regarded as coming from rabû, “to be great.” A late letter-tablet, however (see PSBA, May, 1901, p. 191), gives the form Ammurapi, showing that the initial is not really kh, and that the b of the second element had changed to p (cf Tiglath-pil-eser for Tukulti-abil-ešar, etc). Amraphel (for Amrapel, Amrabel, Amrabe) would therefore seem to be due to Assyr influence, but the final l is difficult to explain. Professor F. Hommel has pointed out, that the Bab rendering, “my family is widespread,” is simply due to the scribes, the first element being the name of the Arab. deity ‘Am, making ‘Ammu-rabi, “Am is great.” Admitting this, it would seem to be certain that Ḫammurabi's dynasty was that designated Arabian by Berosus. Its founder was apparently Sumu-âbi, and Ḫammurabi was the fifth in descent from him. Ḫammurabi's father, Sin-mubaliṭ, and his grandfather, Abil-Sin, are the only rulers of the dynasty which have Bab names, all the others being apparently Arabic.

2. The Years Following His Accession

Concerning Ḫammurabi's early life nothing is recorded, but as he reigned at least 43 years, he must have been young when he came to the throne. His accession was apparently marked by some improvement in the administration of the laws, wherein, as the date-list says, he “established righteousness.” After this, the earlier years of his reign were devoted to such peaceful pursuits as constructing the shrines and images of the gods, and in his 6th year he built the wall of the city of Laz. In his 7th year he took Unug (Erech) and Isin—two of the principal cities of Babylonia, implying that the Dynasty of Babylon had not held sway in all the states.

3. Military Operations and Further Pious Works. Inauguration of His Image

While interesting himself in the all-important work of digging canals, he found time to turn his attention to the land of Yamutbālu (8th year), and in his 10th he possibly conquered, or received the homage of, the city and people (or the army) of Malgia or Malgâ. Next year the city Rabiku was taken by a certain Ibik-Iškur, and also, seemingly, a place called Šalibu. The inauguration of the throne of Zēr-panitu^m, and the setting up, seemingly, of some kind of royal monument, followed, and was succeeded by other religious duties—indeed, work of this nature would seem to have occupied him every year until his 21st, when he built the fortress or fortification of the city Bazu. His 22d year is described as that of his own image as king of righteousness; and the question naturally arises, whether this was the date when he erected the great stele found at Susa in Elam, inscribed with his Code of Laws, which is now in the Louvre. Next year he seems to have fortified the city of Sippar, where, it is supposed, this monument was originally erected.

4. The Capture of Rîm-Sin

Pious works again occupied him until his 30th year, when the army of Elam is referred to, possibly indicating warlike operations, which paved the way for the great campaign of his 31st year, when, “with the help of Anu and Enlil,” he captured Yamutbālu and King Rîm-Sin, the well-known ruler of Larsa. In his 32d year he destroyed the army of Ašnunna or Ešnunnak.

5. Various Works and an Expedition to Mesopotamia

After these victories, Ḫammurabi would seem to have been at peace, and in his 33d year he dug the canal Ḫammurabi-nuhuš-niši, “Ḫammurabi the abundance of the people,” bringing to the fields of his subjects fertility, “according to the wish of Enlila.” The restoration of the great temple at Erech came next, and was followed by the erection of a fortress, “high like a mountain,” on the banks of the Tigris. He also built the fortification of Rabiku on the bank of the Tigris, implying preparations for hostilities, and it was possibly on account of this that the next year he made supplication to Tašmêtu^m, the spouse of Nebo. The year following (his 37th), “by the command of Anu and Enlila,” the fortifications of Maur and Malka were destroyed, after which the country enjoyed a twelvemonth of peace. In all probability, however, this was to prepare for the expedition of his 39th year, when he subjugated Turukku, Kagmû and Subartu, a part of Mesopotamia. The length of this year-date implies that the expedition was regarded as being of importance.

6. His Final Years

Untroubled by foreign affairs, the chief work of Ḫammurabi during his 40th year was the digging of the canal Tišit-Enlila, at Sippar, following this up by the restoration of the temple Ê-mete-ursag and a splendid temple-tower dedicated to Zagaga and Ištar. The defences of his country were apparently his last thought, for his 43d year, which seemingly terminated his reign and his life, was devoted to strengthening the fortifications of Sippar, a work recorded at greater length in several cylinder-inscriptions found on the site.

7. No Record of an Expedition to Palestine

Unfortunately none of the documents referring to his reign makes mention of his attack, in company with the armies of Chedorlaomer, Tidal and Arioch, upon the rebel-kings of Sodom and Gomorrah. This naturally throws doubt on the identification of Ḫammurabi with the Amraphel of Gen 14 1 ff. It must be remembered, however, that we do not possess a complete history either of his life or his rule. That he was a contemporary of Arioch seems undoubted, and if this be the case, Chedorlaomer and Tidal were contemporaries too. Various reasons might be adduced for the absence of references to the campaign in question—his pride may have precluded him from having a year named after an expedition—no matter how satisfactory it may have been—carried out for another power—his suzerain; or the allied armies may have suffered so severely from attacks similar to that delivered by Abraham, that the campaign became an altogether unsuitable one to date by.

8. Period When It May Have Taken Place

If Eri-Aku was, as Thureau-Dangin has suggested, the brother of Rîm-Sin, king of Larsa (Elassar), he must have preceded him on the throne, and, in that case, the expedition against the kings of the Plain took place before Ḫammurabi's 30th year, when he claims to have defeated Rîm-Sin. As the date of Rîm-Sin's accession is doubtful, the date of Eri-Aku's (Arioch's) death is equally so, but it possibly took place about 5 years before Rîm-Sin's defeat. The expedition in question must therefore have been undertaken during the first 25 years of Ḫammurabi's reign. As Amraphel is called king of Shinar (Babylonia), the period preceding Ḫammurabi's accession ought probably to be excluded.

9. Ḫammurabi's Greatness as a Ruler

Of all the kings of early Babylonia so far known, Ḫammurabi would seem to have been one of the greatest, and the country made good progress under his rule. His conflicts with Elam suggest that Babylonia had become strong enough to resist that warlike state, and his title of adda or "father" of Martu (=Amurrū, the Amorites) and of Yamutbālu on the E. implies not only that he maintained the country's influence, but also that, during his reign, it was no longer subject to Elam. Rîm-Sin and the state of Larsa, however, were not conquered until the time of Samsu-iluna, Ḫammurabi's son. It is noteworthy that his Code of Laws (see 3, above) not only determined legal rights and responsibilities, but also fixed the rates of wages, thus obviating many difficulties. I. Historical.—

1. Discovery of the Code

When Professor Meissner published, in 1898, some fragments of cuneiform tablets from the library of the Assyr king Ashurbanipal (668–628 BC), he also then suggested that these pieces were parts of a copy of an old Book of Law from the time of the so-called First Bab Dynasty, one of the kings of which was Hammurabi (more exactly Ḫammurapi, c 2100 BC). A few years later this suggestion was fully established. In December, 1901, and January, 1902, a French expedition under the leadership of M. J. de Morgan, the chief aim of which was the exploration of the old royal city Susa, found there a diorite stone, 2.25 m. high and almost 2 m. in circumference. This stone had a relief (see below) and 44 columns of ancient Bab cuneiform writing graven upon it. Professor V. Scheil, O.P., the Assyriological member of the expedition, recognized at once that this stele contains the collection of laws of King Hammurabi, and published this characteristic discovery as early as 1902 in the official report of the expedition: Délégation en Perse (Tome IV, Paris).

2. Editions, etc, of the Code

At the same time Scheil gave the first tr of the text. Since then the text has several times been published, tr^{d} and commented upon; cf esp.: H. Winckler, Die Gesetze Hammurabis (=Der alte Orient, IV, Leipzig; 1st ed, 1903; 4th ed, 1906); H. Winckler, Die Gesetze Hammurabis in Umschrift und Übersetzung, Leipzig, 1904; D. H. Ungnad, Hammurabis Gesetz, 5 vols, Leipzig, 1904–11.

3. Description of the Stone

The stone has the form of a column the cross-section of which is approximately an ellipse. The upper part of the face has a relief (see illustration). We see the king in supplicating attitude standing before the sun-god who sits upon a throne and is characterized by sun rays which stream out from his shoulders. As the king traced back the derivation of the Code to an inspiration of this god, we may suppose that the relief represents the moment when the king received the laws from the mouth of the god. Lower on the face of the stone are 16 columns of text, which read from top to bottom; 7 other columns were erased some time later than Hammurabi in order to make room for a new inscription. The reverse side contains 28 columns of text.

The stone was set up by the king, toward the end of his reign of 43 years, in the temple Esagila at Babylon, the capital of his dominion (c 2100 BC). It was probably stolen from there by the Elamitic king Shutruk-Nakhunte, in the 12th cent. BC, at the time of the plundering of Babylon, and set up as a trophy of war in the Elamitic capital Susa. The same king had, it would seem, the 7 columns from the face side erased in order to engrave there an account of his own deeds, but through some unknown circumstance this latter was not accomplished. After the discovery of the stele it was brought to Paris where it now forms one of the most important possessions of the Louvre.

Hammurabi Receiving the Laws.

5. Origin and Later History of the Code

If, however, Hammurabi was not the first legislator of Babylonia, still he was, as far as we can see, the first one who used the language of the people, i.e. the Sem idiom. We know that nearly 1,000 years earlier a king, Urukagina, promulgated laws in Babylonia which have been lost; an ancestor of Hammurabi, Sumulaël, appears also to have given laws. As we are able to recognize from the actual practice of Bab social life, the legislation of Hammurabi signifies nothing essentially new. Even before his time laws after the same principles were administered. His service lies before all in that he gathered together the extant laws and set them up in the Sem language. The laws were promulgated already in the 2d year of his reign, but the stele known to us was set up in the temple at Babylon about 30 years later. Moreover, the laws were set up in more than one copy, for in Susa fragments of another copy were found. How long the laws were in actual use it is impossible to determine. In any case, as late as the time of Ashurbanipal (see above), they used to be copied; indeed we even possess copies in neo-Bab characters which are later than the 7th cent. BC. Fortunately the duplicates contain several passages which are destroyed on the large stele in consequence of the erasure of the seven columns. Thus we are able, in spite of the gaps in the large stele, almost completely to determine the contents of the Code.

II. The Contents of the Code.—The laws themselves are preceded by an introduction which was added later, after the law had already been published about 30 years. The introduction states in the first place that already in the primeval age, when Marduk the god of Babylon was elected king of the gods, Hammurabi was predestined by the gods "to cause justice to radiate over the land, to surrender sinners and evildoers to destruction, and to take care that the strong should not oppress the weak." Hammurabi's Code is, indeed, conceived from this standpoint.

Farther on, the king lauds his services to the principal cities of Babylonia, their temples and cults. He appears as a true server of the gods, as a protector of his people and a gracious prince to those who at first would not acknowledge his supremacy. To be sure, this introduction is not entirely free from presumption; for the king describes himself as "god of the kings" and "sun-god of Babylon"! The hopes of a Saviour, which heathen antiquity also knew, he regards as realized in his own person.

The Code itself may be divided into 12 divisions. It manifests, in no way, a very definite logical system; the sequence is often interrupted, and one recognizes that it is not so much a systematic and exhaustive work as a collection of the legal standards accumulated in the course of time. Much that we would expect to find in a Code is not even mentioned.

1. The Principles of Legal Process

The first five paragraphs treat of some principles of legal process. In the first place false accusation is considered. The unprovable charge of sorcery is dealt with in an especially interesting manner (§2). The accused in this case has to submit to an ordeal at the hands of the River-god; nevertheless nothing is said concerning the details of this ordeal. If he is convicted by the god as guilty, the accuser receives his house; in the opposite case, the accuser is condemned to death and the accused receives his house. The law also proceeds rigorously against false witnesses: in a process in which life is at stake, conscious perjury is punished with death (§3). Finally the king strives also for an uncorrupt body of judges; a judge who has not carried out the judgment of the court correctly has not only to pay twelve times the sum at issue, but he is also dismissed with disgrace from his office.

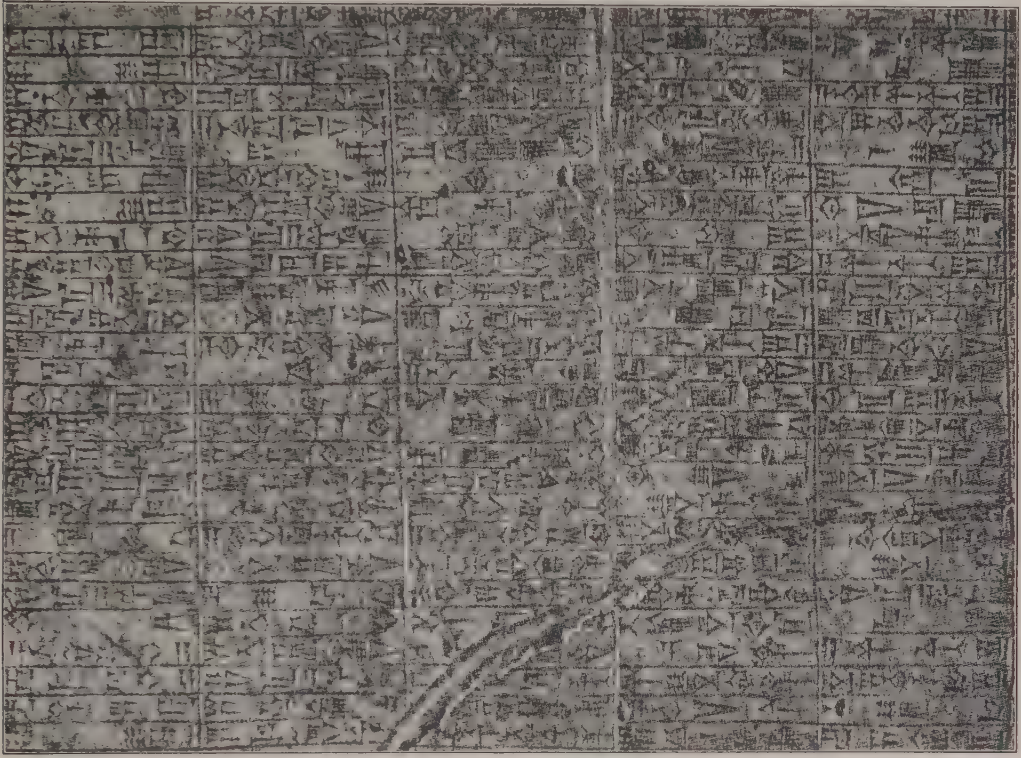
2. Theft, Burglary, Robbery

The next sections (§§6–25) occupy themselves with serious theft, burglary, robbery and other crimes of a like nature. Theft from palace or temple, or the receiving and concealing of stolen property, is punished with death or a heavy fine according to the nature of what is stolen (§§6, 8). As it was a custom in Babylonia to effect every purchase in the presence of witnesses or with a written deed of sale, one understands the regulation that, in certain cases in which witnesses were not forthcoming, or a deed could not be shown, theft was assumed: the guilty person suffered death (§7). A careful procedure is prescribed for the case in which lost goods are found in the hands of another: he who, in the investigation, cannot prove his legitimate right, suffers death, just as a deceiver who tries to enrich himself through making a false accusation (§§9 ff). Kidnapping of a free child or carrying away and concealing a slave from the palace is punished with death (§§14 ff). As slavery had the greatest economic significance in Babylonia, detailed regulations concerning the seizing of runaway slaves and similar matters were given (§§17ff). Burglary, as also robbery, is punished with death (§§21 ff). If a robber is not caught, the persons or corporations responsible for the safety of the land had to make compensation (§§22 ff). Whoever attempts to enrich himself from a building in conflagration is thrown into the fire (§25).

The next paragraphs (§§26–41) control vassalage, particularly in reference to rights and duties of a military kind, concerning which we are not yet quite clear.

3. Laws concerning Vassalage

Here also Hammurabi's care for those of a meaner position is exhibited, since he issues rigid regulations against misuse of the power of office and punishes certain offences of this kind even with death (§ 34). The crown had, in every case, authority in reference to estates in fee which a vassal could not sell, exchange or transmit to his wife or daughters (§§ 36 ff, 41); as a rule the sons took over the estates after the death of the father together with the accompanying rights and duties. The same was the case if, in the service of the king, the father had been lost sight of (§§ 28 f). The estates in fee of what we may call "lay-priestesses" (concerning whom we shall have to speak later) take a special position (§ 40).



Text of the Code of Hammurabi.

4. Immovables

A longer section (§§ 41 ff) is given to immovables (field, garden, house); for the economic life of the ancient Babylonians depended first of all upon the cultivation of grain and date-palms; the legal relations of the land tenants are exactly explained (§§ 42 ff): neglect of his work does not liberate the tenant from his duties to his overlord. On the other hand, in cases of losses through the weather, he is so far released from his duties that of the rent not yet paid he has to pay only an amount corresponding to the quantity of the product of his tenancy (§§ 45 f). Also the landowner with liabilities, who suffers through failure of crops and inundation, enjoys far-reaching protection (§ 48), and his business relations generally are adequately regulated (§§ 49 ff). As the regular irrigation of the fields was the chief condition for profitable husbandry in a land lacking rain, strong laws are made in reference to this: damage resulting from neglect has to be compensated for; indeed, whoever had not the means to do this could be sold with his family into slavery (§§ 53 ff). Special regulations protect the landowner from unlicensed grazing on his fields of crops (§§ 57 f).

The regulations concerning horticulture (§§ 59–66) are similar; here also the relation of the proprietor to the gardener who had to plant or to cultivate the garden is carefully considered; the same is true with respect to the business liabilities of the owner. These regulations concerning horticulture are not entirely preserved upon the stele, but, through the above-mentioned duplicates, we can restore them completely.

Our knowledge concerning the legal relations between house-owners and tenants (§§ 67 ff) is less, because the parts dealing with these on the stele are entirely lost and can only be partially restored from duplicates. Reference is once more made to vassalage (§ 71). The relations between neighbors are also regulated, but we cannot ascertain how in detail (§§ 72 ff). Concerning the precise rights of tenants and landlords we are also but slightly informed (§ 78).

On account of the gaps, we are not able to determine how far the regulations concerning immovables extended. In the gaps there seem to have been still other laws concerning business liabilities. The number of missing paragraphs can only approximately be determined, so that our further enumeration of the paragraphs cannot be regarded as absolutely correct.

5. Trader and Agent

The text begins again with the treatment of the legal relations between the trader and his agents (§§ 100–107); these agents are a kind of officials for the trader whose business they look after. While the Code discusses their responsibilities and duties to their masters, it also protects them from unjust and deceitful ones.

6. Taverns

The taverns of Babylonia (§§ 108–11) seem very often to have been the resort of criminals. As a rule they were in the hands of proprietresses who were made responsible for what took place on their premises (§ 109). Priestesses were forbidden to visit these houses under penalty of being burned (§ 110).

7. Deposits

The next division (§§ 112–26) deals esp. with deposits, although some of its regulations are only indirectly therewith connected. Deceptive messengers are to be punished (§ 112). The debtor is protected from violent encroachments of the creditor (§ 113). Detailed regulations are given concerning imprisonment for debt (§§ 114 ff). The creditor must guard himself from mistreating a person imprisoned for debt, in his house; if a child of the debtor dies through the fault of the creditor, the jus talionis is resorted to: a child of the creditor is killed (§ 116). The members of a family imprisoned for debt have to be released after three years (§ 117). If anyone desires to give something to another to be saved for him, he must do it in the presence of witnesses or draw up a statement of the transaction; otherwise later claims cannot be substantiated (§§ 122 ff). Whoever accepts the objects is responsible for them (§ 125), but is also protected from unjustified claims of his client (§ 126).

8. Family

The sections occupied with the rights of the family are very extensive (§§ 127–95). Matrimony rests upon a contract (§ 128) and presupposes the persistent fidelity of the wife (§§ 129 ff), while the husband is not bound, in this respect, by regulations of any kind. An unfaithful wife may be thrown into the water, but the partner of her sin may also, under certain circumstances, suffer the penalty of death. Long unpreventable absence of the husband justifies the wife to marry again only when she lacks the means of support (§§ 133 ff). On the part of the husband, there are no hindrances to divorce, so long as he settles any matters with his wife concerning her property, provides for the upbringing of the children and, in certain cases, gives a divorce-sum as compensation (§§ 137 ff). Disorderly conduct of the wife is sufficient for the annulling of the marriage; in this case the husband may reduce the wife to the state of a slave (§ 141). The wife may only annul the marriage if her husband grossly neglects his duties toward her (§ 142). If a wife desires the annulling of the marriage for any other reason, she is drowned (§ 143).

As a rule polygamy is not allowed. If a barren wife gives to her husband a slave girl who bears children to him, then he may not marry another wife (§ 144); otherwise he might do so (§ 145). The slave given to the husband is bound to show due deference to her mistress; if she does not do this she loses her privileged position, but she may not be sold if she has borne a child to the husband (§§ 146 f). Incurable disease of the wife is a ground for the marriage of another wife (§§ 148 f).

Gifts of the husband to the wife may not be touched by the children at the death of the husband, but nevertheless property has to remain in the family (§ 150). Debts contracted before the marriage by one side or the other are not binding for the other, if an agreement has been made to that effect (§ 151 f).

Rigid laws are made against abuses in sexual life. The wife who kills her husband for the sake of a lover is impaled upon a stake (§ 153). Incest is punished, according to the circumstances, with exile or death (§§ 154 ff).

Breach of promise by the man without sufficient reason entails to him the loss of all presents made for the betrothed. If the father of the betrothed annuls the engagement, he must give back to the man twice the value of the presents (§§ 159 ff); esp. the sum paid for the wife to her father (Bab terḫâtu).

Matters concerning inheritance are carefully dealt with (§§ 162 ff). The dowry of a wife belongs, after her death, to her children (§ 162). Presents made during the lifetime are not reckoned in the dividing of the inheritance (§ 165), apart from the outlay which a father has to make in the case of each of his sons, the chief portion of which is the money for a wife (§ 166). Children borne from different mothers share the paternal inheritance equally (§ 167).

Disinheritance of a child is permitted only in the case of serious offences after a previous warning (§§ 168 f). Illegitimate children borne from slaves have part in the inheritance only if the father has expressly acknowledged them as his children (§ 170); otherwise, at the death of the father, they are released (§ 171).

The chief wife, whose future needs had not been secured during the lifetime of her husband, receives from the property of the deceased husband a portion equal to that received by each child, but she has only the use of it (§ 172). A widow may marry again, but then she loses all claim on the property of her first husband, in favor of his children (§§ 172, 177); the children of both her marriages share her own property equally (§§ 173 f).

The children from free women married to slaves are free (§ 175). The master of the slave has only a claim to half of the property of the slave which he has acquired during such a marriage (§§ 176 f).

Unmarried daughters mostly became priestesses or entered a religious foundation (Bab malgû); they also received, very often, a sort of dowry, which, however, remained under the control of their brothers and which, on the death of the former, fell to the brothers and sisters, if their fathers had not expressly given them a free hand in this matter (§§ 178 f). In cases where the father did not give such a dowry, the daughter received, from the property left, a share equal to that of the others, but only for use; those dedicated to a goddess obtained only a third of such an amount (§ 180 f). The lay-priestesses of the god Marduk of Babylon enjoyed special privileges in that they had full control over any property thus acquired (§ 182).

As a rule, adopted children could not be dismissed again (§§ 185 ff). Parents who had given their child to a master, who had adopted it and taught it handwork, could not claim it again (§§ 188 f). Gross insubordination of certain adopted children of a lower class is severely punished by the cutting off of the tongue (§ 192) or the tearing out of an eye (§ 193). Deceitful wet-nurses are also severely punished (§ 194). The last paragraph of this section (§ 195) states the punishment for children who strike their father as the cutting off of the hand.

9. Concerning Wounding, etc

The next division (§§ 196–227) occupies itself with wounding of all kinds, in the first place with the jus talionis: an eye for an eye, a bone for a bone, a tooth for a tooth. Persons lower in the social grade usually accepted money instead (§§ 196 ff). A box on the ears inflicted by a free man upon a free man cost the former 60 shekels (§ 203); in the case of one half-free, 10 shekels (§ 204); but if a slave so strikes a free man, his ear is to be cut off (§ 205). Unintentional wounding of the body, which proves to be fatal, is covered by a fine (§§ 207 f). Anyone who strikes a pregnant free woman, so as to cause a miscarriage and the death of the woman, is punished by having his daughter killed (§ 210); in the case of a half-free woman or a slave, a money compensation was sufficient (§§ 212 ff).

The surgeon is responsible for certain operations; if they succeed, he receives a legally determined high reward; if they fail, under certain circumstances his hand might be cut off (§§ 215 ff). Certainly this law was an effective preventive against quacks! Farther on come regulations concerning the fees of surgeons (§§ 221 ff) and veterinary surgeons; to a certain degree the latter are responsible for the killing of an animal under their charge (§§ 224 f).

10. Building of Houses and Ships

Later, the building of houses and ships is treated of (§§ 228–40). The builder is responsible for the stability of the house built by him; if it falls down and kills the master of the house, the builder is killed; if it kills a child of the house, a child of the builder is killed (§§ 229 f). For any other damages incurred, the builder is likewise responsible (§§ 231 ff). The regulations for the builders of ships are similar (§§ 234 ff). The man who hires a ship is answerable to the proprietor (§§ 236 ff). With the busy shipping trade on the canals, special attention had to be given to prevent accidents (§ 240).

11. Hiring in General, etc

Already in earlier sections there were regulations concerning hiring (rent) and wages. This eleventh division (§§ 241–77) deals with the matter more in detail, but it also brings many things forward which are only slightly related thereto. It states tariffs for working animals (§§ 242 f), and in conclusion to this makes equally clear to what extent the hirer of such an animal is responsible for harm to the animal (§§ 244 ff). Special attention must be given an ox addicted to goring (§§ 250 ff; see below). Care is taken that unfaithful stewards do not escape their punishment: in gross cases of breach of confidence they are punished with the cutting off of the hand or by being torn (in the manner of being tortured on a rack) by oxen (§§ 253 ff). The wages for agricultural laborers are determined (§§ 257 f), and in connection with this, lesser cases of theft of field-utensils are considered and covered by a money fine (§§ 259 f). The wages of a shepherd and his duties form the subject of some other paragraphs (§§ 261 ff). Finally, matters having to do with hiring are mentioned: the hiring of animals for threshing (§§ 268 ff), of carriages (§ 271), wages of laborers (§ 273) and handworkers (§ 274), and the hire of ships (§§ 276 f).

12. Slaves

The last division (§§ 278–82) treats of slaves in so far as they are not already mentioned. The seller is responsible to the buyer that the slave does not suffer from epilepsy (§ 278), and that nobody else has a claim upon him (§ 279). Slaves of Bab origin, bought in a foreign land, must be released, if they are brought back to Babylonia and recognized by their former master (§ 280). If a slave did not acknowledge his master, his ear could be cut off (§ 282).

Here the laws come to an end. In spite of many regulations which seem to us cruel, they show keen sense of justice and impartiality. Thus the king, in an epilogue, rightly extols himself as a shepherd of salvation, as a helper of the oppressed, as an adviser of widows and orphans, in short, as the father of his people. In conclusion, future rulers are admonished to respect his laws, and the blessings of the gods are promised to those who do so. But upon those who might attempt to abolish the Code he calls down the curse of all the great gods, individually and collectively. With that the stele ends.

III. The Significance of the Code has been recognized ever since its discovery; for, indeed, it is the most ancient collection of laws which we know. For judgment concerning the ancient Bab civilization, for the history of slavery, for the position of woman and many other questions the Code offers the most important material. The fact that law and religion are nearly always distinctly separated is worthy of special attention.

1. Hammurabi and Moses

It is not to be wondered at that a monument of such importance demands comparison with similar monuments. In this reference the most important question is as to the relation in which the Code stands to the Law of Moses. Hammurabi was not only king of Babylonia but also of Amurru (= "land of the Amorites"), called later Pal and Western Syria. As his successors also retained the dominion over Amurru, it is quite possible that, for a considerable time, the laws of Hammurabi were in force here also, even if perhaps in a modified form. In the time of Abraham, for example, one may consider the narratives of Sarah and Hagar (Gen 16 1 ff), and Rachel and Bilhah (Gen 30 1 ff), which show the same juridical principles as the Code (cf §§ 144 ff; see above). Other narratives of the OT indicate the same customs as the Code does for Babylonia; cf Gen 24 53, where the bridal gifts to Rebekah correspond to the Bab terḫâtu (§ 159); similarly Gen 31 14 f.

Between the Code and the Law of Moses, esp. in the so-called Book of the Covenant (Ex 20 22—23 33), there are indeed extraordinary parallels. We might mention here the following examples:

Ex 21 2: "If thou buy a Heb servant, six years he shall serve: and in the seventh he shall go out free for nothing." Similarly, CH, § 117: "If a man become involved in debt, and give his wife, his son or his daughter for silver or for labor, they shall serve three years in the house of their purchaser or bondmaster: in the fourth year they shall regain their freedom."

Ex 21 15: "And he that smiteth his father, or his mother, shall be surely put to death." Cf CH, § 195: "If a son strike his father, his hand shall be cut off."

Ex 21 18 f: "And if men contend, and one smite the other with a stone, or with his fist, and he die not, but keep his bed; if he rise again, and walk abroad upon his staff, then shall he that smote him be quit: only he shall pay for the loss of his time, and shall cause him to be thoroughly healed." Cf CH, § 206: "If a man strike another man in a noisy dispute and wound him, that man shall swear, 'I did not strike him knowingly'; and he shall pay for the physician."

Ex 21 22: "If men strive together, and hurt a woman with child, so that her fruit depart, and yet no harm follow; he shall surely be fined, according as the woman's husband shall lay upon him; and he shall pay as the judges determine." Cf CH, § 209: "If a man strike a free woman and cause her fruit to depart, he shall pay ten shekels of silver for her fruit."

Ex 21 24: "Eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot." Cf CH, § 196: "If a man destroy the eye of a free man, his eye shall be destroyed." § 197: "If he break the bone of a free man, his bone shall be broken." § 200: "If a man knock out the teeth of a man of the same rank, his teeth shall be knocked out."

Ex 21 28–32: "If an ox gore a man or a woman to death, the ox shall be surely stoned, and its flesh shall not be eaten; but the owner of the ox shall be quit. But if the ox was wont to gore in time past, and it hath been testified to its owner, and he hath not kept it in, but it hath killed a man or a woman; the ox shall be stoned, and its owner also shall be put to death. . . . . If the ox gore a man-servant or a maid-servant, there shall be given unto their master 30 shekels of silver, and the ox shall be stoned." Cf CH, §§ 250 ff: "If an ox, while going along the street, gore a man and cause his death, no claims of any kind can be made. If a man's ox be addicted to goring and have manifested to him his failing, that it is addicted to goring, and, nevertheless, he have neither blunted his horns, nor fastened up his ox; then if his ox gore a free man and cause his death, he shall give 30 shekels of silver. If it be a man's slave, he shall give 20 shekels of silver."

Ex 22 7 ff reminds one of CH, §§ 124 ff; Ex 22 10 ff of CH, §§ 244 ff and 266 f.

The resemblances between the other parts of the Pent and the Code are not so striking as those between the Code and the Book of the Covenant; nevertheless one may compare Lev 19 35 f with CH, § 5; Lev 20 10 with CH, § 129; Lev 24 19 f with CH, §§ 196 ff; Lev 25 39 ff with CH, § 117; Dt 19 16 ff with CH, §§ 3 f; Dt 22 22 with CH, § 129; Dt 24 1 with CH, §§ 137 ff and §§ 148 f; Dt 24 7 with CH, § 14; esp. Dt 21 15 ff.18 ff, with CH, §§ 167, 168 f, where, in both cases, there is a transition from regulations concerning the property left by a man, married several times, to provisions referring to the punishment of a disobedient son, certainly a remarkable agreement in sequence.

One can hardly assert that the parallels quoted are accidental, but just as little could one say that they are directly taken from the Code; for they bear quite a definite impression due to the Israelitish culture, and numerous marked divergences also exist. As we have already mentioned, the land Amurru was for a time Bab territory, so that Bab law must have found entrance there. When the Israelites came into contact with Bab culture, on taking possession of the land of Canaan (a part of the old Amurru), it was natural that they should employ the results of that culture as far as they found them of use for themselves. Under no circumstances may one suppose here direct quotation. Single parts of the Laws of Moses, esp. the Decalogue (Ex 20), with its particularly pointed conciseness, have no ‖ in CH.

2. The Code and Other Legal Systems

It has also been attempted to establish relations between the Code and other legal systems. In the Talm, esp. in the fourth order of the Mishnāh called n^e zīḳīn (i.e. "damages"), there are many regulations which remind one of the Code. But one must bear in mind that the Jews during the exile could hardly have known the Code in detail; if there happen to be similarities, these are to be explained by the fact that many of the regulations of the Code were still retained in the later Bab law, and the Talm drew upon this later Bab law for many regulations which seemed useful for its purposes. The connection is therefore an indirect one.

The similarities with the remains of old Arabian laws and the so-called Syrio-Rom Lawbook (5th cent. AD) have to be considered in the same way, though some of these agreements may have only come about accidentally.

That the similarities between Rom and Gr legal usages and the Code are only of an accidental nature may be taken as assured. This seems all the more probable, in that between the Code and other legal systems there are quite striking similarities in individual points, even though we cannot find any historical connection, e.g. the Salic law, the lawbook of the Salic Franks, compiled about 500 AD, and which is the oldest preserved Germanic legal code.

Until a whole number of lost codes, as the Old Amoritish and the neo-Bab, are known to us in detail, one must guard well against hasty conclusions. In any case it is rash to speak of direct borrowings where there may be a whole series of mediating factors.

ARTHUR UNGNAD

HAMONAH, ha-mō′na (הֲמוֹנָה, hămōnāh): The name of a city which stood apparently near HAMON-GOG (q.v.) (Ezk 39 16).

HAMON-GOG, hā′mon-gog (הֲמוֹן־גּוֹג, hămōn-gōgh, "the multitude of Gog"): The name of the place where "Gog and all his multitude" are to be buried (Ezk 39 11.15). By a change in the pointing of ver 11, hā-ʿăbhārīm for hā-ʿōbh^e rīm, we should read "valley of Abarim" for "valley of them that pass through." In that case it would seem that the prophet thought of some ravine in the mountains E. of the Dead Sea.

HAMOR, hā′mor (חֲמוֹר, ḥămōr, "an ass"; Ἐμμώρ, Emmōr): Hamor was the father of Shechem from whom Jacob bought a piece of ground on his return from Paddan-aram for one hundred pieces of silver (Gen 33 19), and the burial place of Joseph when his body was removed from Egypt to Canaan (Josh 24 32). "The men of Hamor" were inhabitants of Shechem, and suffered a great loss under Abimelech, a prince over Israel (Jgs 9 22–49). Dinah, Jacob's daughter, was criminally treated by Hamor, who requested her to be given to him in marriage, in which plan he had the coöperation of his father, Shechem. The sons of Jacob rejected their proposition and laid a scheme by which the inhabitants of the city were circumcised, and in the hour of helplessness slew all the males, thus wreaking special vengeance upon Hamor and his father Shechem. It is mere conjecture to claim that Hamor and Dinah were personifications of early central Palestinian clans in sharp antagonism, and that the course of Simeon and Levi was really the treachery of primitive tribes. Because the word Hamor means "an ass" and Shechem "a shoulder," there is no reason for rejecting the terms as designations of individuals and considering the titles as mere tribal appellations. HAMRAN, ham′ran. See HEMDAN.

HAMUEL, ham′ū-el, ha-mū′el. See HAMMUEL.

HAMUL, hā′mul (חָמוּל, ḥāmūl, "pitied," "spared"): A son of Perez, and head of one of the clans of Judah (Gen 46 12; 1 Ch 2 5; Nu 26 21). His descendants were called Hamulites.

HAMUTAL, ha-mū′tal (חֲמוּטַל, ḥămūṭal, "father-in-law" or "kinsman of the dew"): A daughter of Jeremiah of Libnah, and wife of King Josiah, and mother of Jehoahaz and Zedekiah (2 K 23 31; 24 18; Jer 52 1). In the last two references and in the LXX the name appears as "Hamital." Swete gives a number of variants, e.g. 2 K 24 18: B, Μιτάτ, Mitát, A, Ἀμιτάθ, Amitáth; Jer 52 1: B, Ἁμειταάλ, Hameitaál, א A Ἁμιταάλ, Hamitaál, Q, Ἁμιτάλ, Hamitál.

HANAMEL, han′a-mel (חֲנַמְאֵל, hănam′ēl; AV Hanameel, ha-nam′ē-el): The son of Shallum, Jeremiah's uncle, of whom the prophet, while in prison, during the time when Jerus was besieged by the Chaldaeans, bought a field with due formalities, in token that a time would come when house and vineyards would once more be bought in the land (Jer 32 6–15).

HANAN, hā′nan (חָנָן, ḥānān, "gracious"):

(1) A chief of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Ch 8 23).

(2) The youngest son of Azel, a descendant of Saul (1 Ch 8 38; 9 44).

(3) One of David's mighty men of valor (1 Ch 11 43).

(4) The head of a family of the Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 46; Neh 7 49).

(5) An assistant of Ezra in expounding the law (Neh 8 7). Possibly the same person is referred to in Neh 10 10 (11).

(6) One of the four treasurers put in charge of the tithes by Nehemiah (Neh 13 13).

(7, 8) Two who "sealed the covenant" on the eve of the restoration (Neh 10 22 [23].26 [27]).

(9) A son of Igdaliah, "the man of God," whose sons had a chamber in the temple at Jerus (Jer 35 4).

Byron H. DeMent

HANANEL, han′an-el, THE TOWER OF (חֲנַנְאֵל, ḥănan′ēl, "'ēl is gracious"; AV Hananeel, ha-nan′ē-el): A tower in the walls of Jerus adjoining (Neh 3 1; 12 39) the tower of Hammeah (q.v.). The company of Levites coming from the W. passed "by the fish gate, and the tower of Hananel, and the tower of Hammeah, even unto the sheep gate" (Neh 12 39). In Jer 31 38 it is foretold "that the city shall be built to Jeh from the tower of Hananel unto the gate of the corner"—apparently the whole stretch of N. wall. In Zec 14 10 it says Jerus "shall dwell in her place, from Benjamin's gate unto the place of the first gate, unto the corner gate, and from the tower of Hananel unto the king's winepresses." These last were probably near Siloam, and the distance "from the tower of Hananel unto the king's winepresses" describes the greatest length of the city from N. to S. All the indications point to a tower, close to the tower of Hammeah, near the N.E. corner, a point of the city always requiring special fortification and later the sites successively of the Baris and of the Antonia. See Jerusalem.

HANANI, ha-nā′nī (חֲנָנִי, ḥănānī, "gracious"):

(1) A musician and son of Heman, David's seer, and head of one of the courses of the temple service (1 Ch 25 4.25).

(2) A seer, the father of Jehu. He was cast into prison for his courage in rebuking Asa for relying on Syria (1 K 16 1.7; 2 Ch 19 2; 20 34).

(3) A priest, of the sons of Immer, who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 20).

(4) A brother or kinsman of Nehemiah who carried news of the condition of the Jews in Pal to Susa and became one of the governors of Jerus (Neh 1 2; 7 2).

(5) A priest and chief musician who took part in the dedication of the walls of Jerus (Neh 12 36).

HANANIAH, han-a-nī′a (חֲנַנְיָהוּ, ḥănanyāhū, חֲנַנְיָה, ḥănanyāh; 'Ανανίας, Ananías; also with aspirate, "Jeh hath been gracious"): This was a common name in Israel for many centuries.

(1) A Benjamite (1 Ch 8 24).

(2) A captain of Uzziah's army (2 Ch 26 11).

(3) Father of one of the princes under Jehoiakim (Jer 36 12).

(4) One of the sons of Heman and leader of the 16th division of David's musicians (1 Ch 25 4.23).

(5) Grandfather of the officer of the guard which apprehended Jeremiah on a charge of desertion (Jer 37 13).

(6) A false prophet of Gibeon, son of Azzur, who opposed Jeremiah, predicting that the yoke of Babylon would be broken in two years, and that the king, the people and the vessels of the temple would be brought back to Jerus. Jeremiah would be glad if it should be so, nevertheless it would not be. The question then arose, Which is right, Jeremiah or Hananiah? Jeremiah claimed that he was right because he was in accordance with all the great prophets of the past who prophesied evil and their words came true. Therefore his words are more likely to be true. The prophet of good, however, must wait to have his prophecy fulfilled before he can be accredited. Hananiah took off the yoke from Jeremiah and broke it in pieces, symbolic of the breaking of the power of Babylon. Jeremiah was seemingly beaten, retired and received a message from Jeh that the bar of wood would become a bar of iron, and that Hananiah would die during the year because he had spoken rebellion against Jeh (Jer 28 passim).

(7) One of Daniel's companions in Babylon whose name was changed to Shadrach (Dnl 1 7.11.19).

(8) A son of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3 19.21).

(9) A Levite, one of the sons of Bebai, one of those who married foreign wives (Ezr 10 28; 1 Esd 9 29).

(10) One of the perfumers (AV "apothecaries") who wrought in rebuilding the wall under Nehemiah (Neh 3 8).

(11) One who helped to repair the wall above the horse gate (Neh 3 30). This may be the same person as no. 10.

(12) A governor of the castle, i.e. the bīrāh or fortress, and by Nehemiah placed in charge of the whole city of Jerus, because "he was a faithful man, and feared God above many" (Neh 7 2).

(13) One of those who sealed the covenant under Nehemiah (Neh 10 23); a Levite.

(14) A priest who was present at the dedication of the walls of Jerus (Neh 12 12.41).

1. The Human Hand: Various Uses

The human hand (considered physically) and, anthropopathically, the hand of God (Gen 3 22; Ps 145 16): The hand included the wrist, as will be seen from all passages in which bracelets are mentioned as ornaments of the hand, e.g. Gen 24 22.30.47; Ezk 16 11; 23 42, or where the Bible speaks of fetters on the hands (Jgs 15 14, etc). On the other hand, it cannot seem strange that occasionally the expression "hand" may be used for a part, e.g. the fingers, as in Gen 41 42, etc. According to the lex talionis, justice demanded "hand for hand" (Ex 21 24; Dt 19 21). We enumerate the following phrases without claiming to present a complete list: "To fill the hand" (Ex 32 29 m; 1 Ch 29 5 m) means to consecrate, evidently from the filling of hands with sacrificial portions for the altar. Cf also Lev 7 37; 8 22.28.29.31.33, where the sacrifice, the ram, the basket of consecration are mentioned. "To put or set the hand unto" (Dt 15 10; 23 20; 28 8.20), to commence to do; "to put forth the hand" (Gen 3 22; 8 9); "to stretch out the hand" (Ezk 25 13.16; Zeph 2 13); "to shake or wag the hand upon" (Isa 10 32; Zeph 2 15; Zec 2 9), to defy. "To lay the hand upon the head" (2 S 13 19) is an expression of sadness and mourning, as we see from Egyp representations of scenes of mourning. Both in joy and in anger hands are "smitten together" (Nu 24 10), and people "clap their hands" at a person or over a person in spiteful triumph (Job 27 23; Lam 2 15; Nah 3 19). "To put one's life into one's hand" is to risk one's life (1 S 19 5; 28 21). "To lay hands upon" is used in the sense of blessing (Mt 19 13), or is symbolical in the act of miraculous healing (Mt 9 18; Mk 8 23; Acts 28 8), or an emblem of the gift of the Holy Spirit and His endowments (Acts 8 17–19; 13 3; 1 Tim 4 14; 2 Tim 1 6); but it also designates the infliction of cruelty and punishment (Gen 37 22; Lev 24 14), the imposition of responsibility (Nu 8 10; Dt 34 9). Thus also the sins of the people were symbolically transferred upon the goat which was to be sent into the wilderness (Lev 16 21). This act, rabbinical writings declare, was not so much a laying on of hands, as a vigorous pressing. "Lifting up the hand" was a gesture accompanying an oath (Dt 32 40) or a blessing pronounced over a multitude (Lev 9 22; Lk 24 50), a prayer (Ps 119 48). "To put the hands to the mouth" is indicative of (compulsory) silence (Job 21 5; 40 4; Prov 30 32; Mic 7 16). To "slack one's hand" is synonymous with negligence and neglect (Josh 10 6), and "to hide or bury the hand in the dish" is descriptive of the slothful, who is tired even at meals (Prov 19 24; 26 15).

2. The Hand as Power

The hand in the sense of power and authority: (cf Assyr îdu, "strength"); Josh 8 20 m, "They had no hands [RV "power"] to flee this way or that way"; Jgs 1 35, "The hand of the house of Joseph prevailed"; Ps 76 5, "None of the men of might have found their hands"; Ps 89 48 m, "shall deliver his soul from the hand [RV "power"] of Sheol"; 2 K 3 15, "The hand of Jeh came upon him"; Ex 14 31 m, "Israel saw the great hand [RV "work"] which Jeh did upon the Egyptians"; Dt 34 12, "in all the mighty hand . . . . which Moses wrought in the sight of all Israel."

3. The Hand for the Person

The hand used (pars pro toto) for the person: "His hand shall be against every man" (Gen 16 12). "Slay the priests of Jeh; because their hand also is with David" (1 S 22 17). "Jonathan went to David into the wood and strengthened his hand in God" (1 S 23 16). In this sense penalty is exacted "from the hand" or "at the hand" of the transgressor (Gen 9 5; Ezk 33 8).

4. Hand, Meaning Side

The hand in the sense of side: "All the side [Heb "hand"] of the river Jabbok" (Dt 2 37); "by the wayside" (Heb "by the hand of the way," 1 S 4 13). The MSS have here the error יָךְ, yakh, for יַד, yādh; cf the Heb of Ps 140 5[6] (לְיַד־מַעְגָּל, lᵉyādh maʽgāl); "On the side [Heb "hand"] of their oppressors there was power" (Eccl 4 1); "I was by the side [Heb "hand"] of the great river" (Dnl 10 4).

5. English Idiom

Mention must also be made here of the Eng. idiom, "at hand," frequently found in our VSS of the Scriptures. In Heb and Gr there is no reference to the word "hand," but words designating nearness of time or place are used. The usual word in Heb is קָרַב, ķārabh, "to be near," and קָרוֹב, ķārōbh, "near"; in Gr ἐγγύς, eggús, "near," and the vb. ἐγγίζω, eggízō, "to come near." Rarely other words are used, as ἐνέστηκεν, enéstēken, "has come," ERV "is now present" (2 Thess 2 2), and ἐφέστηκεν, ephéstēken, "is come" (2 Tim 4 6).

Frequently the words refer to the "day" or "coming of the Lord"; still it must not be forgotten that it may often refer to the nearness of God in a local sense, as in Jer 23 23, "Am I a God at hand, saith Jeh, and not a God afar off?" and probably in Phil 4 5, "The Lord is at hand," though many, perhaps most, commentators regard the expression as a version of the Aram. μαρὰν ἀθά, marán athá (1 Cor 16 22). Passages such as Ps 31 20; 119 151; Mt 28 20 would, however, speak for an interpretation which lays the ictus on the abiding presence of the Lord with the believer.

NOTE.—The ancients made a careful distinction of the respective values of the two hands. This is perhaps best seen from Gen 48 13–19, where the imposition of the hands of aged Israel upon the heads of Joseph's sons seems unfair to their father, because the left hand is being placed upon the elder, the right hand upon the younger son. The very word euōnumos proves the same from the Gr point of view. This word is a euphemistic synonym of aristera, and is used to avoid the unlucky omen the common word may have for the person spoken to. Thus the goats, i.e. the godless, are placed at the left hand of the great Judge, while the righteous appear at His right (Mt 25 33). We read in Eccl 10 2, "A wise man's heart is at his right hand; but a fool's heart at his left," i.e. is inclined to evil. As the Jews orientated themselves by looking toward the rising of the sun (Lat oriens, the east), the left hand represented the north, and the right hand the south (1 S 23 19.24; 2 S 24 5). The right hand was considered the more honorable (1 K 2 19; Ps 45 9); therefore it was given in attestation of a contract, a federation or fellowship (Gal 2 9). It is the more valuable in battle; a friend or protector will therefore take his place at the right to guard it (Ps 16 8; 73 23; 109 31; 110 5; 121 5), but the enemy will, for the same reason, try to assail it (Job 30 12; Ps 109 6; Zec 3 1). It was also the unprotected side, because the shield was carried on the left arm: hence the point of danger and honor. The right hand is also the side of power and strength (Ps 60 5; 63 8; 108 6; 118 15.16; 110 1; Mt 22 44; Mt 20 21.23). Both hands are mentioned together in the sense of close proximity, intimate association, in Mk 10 37.

HANDBREADTH, hand′bredth (טֶפַח, ṭephaḥ, טֹפַח, ṭōphaḥ, 1 K 7 26; 2 Ch 4 5; Ps 39 5; Ex 25 25; 37 12; Ezk 40 5.43; 43 13): A Heb linear measure containing 4 fingers, or digits, and equal to about 3 in. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

HANDFUL, hand′fo͝ol: There are five words in Heb used to indicate what may be held in the hand, either closed or open.

(1) חֹפֶן, ḥōphen, חָפְנַיִם, ḥophnayim. The fist or closed hand occurs in the dual in Ex 9 8, where it signifies what can be taken in the two hands conjoined, a double handful.

(2) כַּף, kaph, "hollow of the hand," the palm; an open handful (Lev 9 17; 1 K 17 12; Eccl 4 6).

(3) עָמִיר, ʽāmīr, "sheaf or bundle." It signifies the quantity of grain a gleaner may gather in his hand (Jer 9 22 [Heb 21]).

(4) קֹמֶץ, ķōmeç, "the closed handful" (Gen 41 47; Lev 2 2; 5 12; 6 15 [Heb 6 8]; Nu 5 26).

(5) שֹׁעַל, shōʽal, "the hollow of the hand," or what can be held in it (1 K 20 10; Ezk 13 19). In Isa 40 12 it signifies "measure."

(6) פִּסָּה, piṣṣāh (Ps 72 16) is rendered "handful" by AV, but is properly "abundance" as in RV.

H. PORTER

HANDICRAFT, han′di-kraft. See CRAFTS.

HANDKERCHIEF, haṇ′kẽr-chif (σουδάριον, soudárion): A loan-word from the Lat sudarium, found in pl. in Acts 19 12, soudária; cf sudor, "perspiration"; lit. "a cloth used to wipe off perspiration." Elsewhere it is rendered "napkin" (Lk 19 20; Jn 11 44; 20 7), for which see DRESS; NAPKIN.

HANDLE, han′d’l (כַּף, kaph): The noun occurs once in Cant 5 5, “handles of the bolt” (AV “lock”). The vb. “handle” represents several Heb (’āḥaz, māshakh, tāphas, etc) and Gr (θιγγάνω, thiggánō, Col 2 21; ψηλαφάω, psēlapháō, Lk 24 39; 1 Jn 1 1) words in AV, but is also sometimes substituted in RV for other renderings in AV, as in Cant 3 8 for “hold”; in Lk 20 11, “handled shamefully,” for “entreated shamefully”; in 2 Tim 2 15, “handling aright,” for “rightly dividing,” etc.

HANDMAID, hand′mād: Which appears often in the OT, but seldom in the NT, like bondmaid, is used to translate two Heb words (שִׁפְחָה, shiphḥāh, and אָמָה, ’āmāh), both of which normally mean a female slave. It is used to translate the former word in the ordinary sense of female slave in Gen 16 1; 25 12; 29 24.29; Prov 30 23; Jer 34 11.16; Joel 2 29; to translate the latter word in Ex 23 12; Jgs 19 19; 2 S 6 20. It is used as a term of humility and respectful self-depreciation in the presence of great men, prophets and kings, to translate the former word in Ruth 2 13; 1 S 1 18; 28 21; 2 S 14 6; 2 K 4 2.16; it translates the latter word in the same sense in Ruth 3 9; 1 S 1 16; 25 24.28.31.41; 2 S 20 17; 1 K 1 13.17; 3 20. It is also used to express a sense of religious humility in translating the latter word only, and appears in this sense in but three passages, 1 S 1 11; Ps 86 16; 116 16.

In the NT it occurs 3 t, in a religious sense, as the tr of δούλη, doúlē, “a female slave” (Lk 1 38.48; Acts 2 18), and twice (Gal 4 22.23) as the tr of παιδίσκη, paidískē, AV “bondmaid.”

HANDS, IMPOSITION, im-pŏ-zish′un (LAYING ON), OF (ἐπίθεσις χειρῶν, epíthesis cheirôn, Acts 8 18; 1 Tim 4 14; 2 Tim 1 6; He 6 2): The act or ceremony of the imposition of hands appears in the OT in various connections: in the act of blessing (Gen 48 14 ff); in the ritual of sacrifice (hands of the offerer laid on head of victim, Ex 29 10.15.19; Lev 1 4; 3 2.8.13; 4 4.24.29; 8 14; 16 21); in witness-bearing in capital offences (Lev 24 14). The tribe of Levi was set apart by solemn imposition of hands (Nu 8 10); Moses appointed Joshua to be his successor by a similar act (Nu 27 18.23; Dt 34 9). The idea in these cases varies with the purpose of the act. The primary idea seems to be that of conveyance or transference (cf Lev 16 21), but, conjoined with this, in certain instances, are the ideas of identification and of devotion to God.

In the NT Jesus laid hands on the little children (Mt 19 13.15 ‖ Mk 10 16) and on the sick (Mt 9 18; Mk 6 5, etc), and the apostles laid hands on those whom they baptized that they might receive the Holy Spirit (Acts 8 17.19; 19 6), and in healing (Acts 12 17). Specially the imposition of hands was used in the setting apart of persons to a particular office or work in the church. This is noticed as taking place in the appointment of the Seven (Acts 6 6), in the sending out of Barnabas and Saul (Acts 13 3), at the ordination of Timothy (1 Tim 4 14; 2 Tim 1 6), but though not directly mentioned, it seems likely that it accompanied all acts of ordination of presbyters and deacons (cf 1 Tim 5 22; He 6 2). The presbyters could hardly convey what they had not themselves received (1 Tim 1 14). Here again the fundamental idea is communication. The act of laying on of hands was accompanied by prayer (Acts 6 6; 8 15; 13 3), and the blessing sought was imparted by God Himself. No ground is afforded by this symbolical action for a sacrament of “Orders.” See Sacrifice; Ministry; Ordination.

HANDSTAFF, hand′staf (מַקֵּל יָד, maḳḳēl yādh): In pl. in Ezk 39 9, among weapons of war. See Staff.

HAND WEAPON, hand′wep′un (Nu 35 18 AV). See Armor.

HANDWRITING, hand′rīt-ing. See Writing; Manuscripts.

HANES, hā′nēz (חָנֵס, ḥānēṣ): Occurs only in Isa 30 4. The one question of importance concerning this place is its location. It has never been certainly identified. It was probably an Egyp city, though even that is not certain. Pharaoh, in his selfish haste to make league with the kingdom of Judah, may have sent his ambassadors far beyond the frontier. The language of Isa, “Their ambassadors came to H.,” certainly seems to indicate a place in the direction of Jerus from Tanis. This indication is also the sum of all the evidence yet available. There is no real knowledge concerning the exact location of H. Opinions on the subject are little more than clever guesses. They rest almost entirely upon etymological grounds, a very precarious foundation when not supported by historical evidence. The LXX has, “For there are in Tanis princes, wicked messengers.” Evidently knowing no such place, they tried to translate the name. The Aram. version gives “Tahpanhes” for H., which may have been founded upon exact knowledge, as we shall see.

H. has been thought by some commentators to be Heracleopolis Magna, Egyp Hunensuten, abridged to Hunensu, Copt Ahnes, Heb Ḥānēṣ, Arab. Ahneysa, the capital of the XXth Nome, or province, of ancient Egypt. It was a large city on an island between the Nile and the Bahr Yuseph, opposite the modern town of Beni Suef. The Greeks identified the ram-headed god of the place with Heracles, hence, “Heracleopolis.” The most important historical notes in Egypt and the best philological arguments point to this city as H. But the plain meaning of Isa 30 4 points more positively to a city somewhere in the delta nearer to Jerus than Tanis (cf Naville’s cogent argument, “Ahnas el Medineh,” 3–4). Dumichen considered the hieroglyphic name of Tahpanhes to be Hens. Knowledge of this as a fact may have influenced the Aram. rendering, but does not warrant the arbitrary altering of the Heb text.

HANGING, hang′ing (תָּלָה, tālāh, “to hang up,” “suspend,” 2 S 21 12; Dt 28 66; Job 26 7; Ps 137 2; Cant 4 4; Hos 11 7): Generally, where the word is used in connection with punishments, it appears to have reference to the hanging of the corpse after execution. We find but two clear instances of death by hanging, i.e. strangulation—those of Ahithophel and Judas ((2 S 17 23; Mt 27 5), and both these were cases of suicide, not of execution. The foregoing Heb word is clearly used for “hanging” as a mode of execution in Est 5 14; 6 4; 7 9 ff; 8 7; 9 13.14.25; but probably the “gallows” or “tree” (עֵץ, ‘ēç) was a stake for the purpose of impaling the victim. It could be lowered for this purpose, then raised “fifty cubits high” to arrest the public gaze. The Gr word used in Mt 27 5 is ἀπάγχεσθαι, apágchesthai, “to strangle oneself.” See HDB, art. “Hanging,” for an exhaustive discussion.

HANGINGS, hang′ingz:

(1) In EV this word in the pl. represents the Heb קְלָעִים, ḳelā‘īm, the curtains of “fine twined linen” with which the court of the tabernacle was inclosed.

These were five cubits in height, and of lengths corresponding to the sides of the inclosure and the space on either side of the entrance in front, and were suspended from hooks fastened to the pillars of the court. They are described at length in Ex 27 9–15; 38 9–18. See, besides, Ex 35 17; 39 40; Nu 3 26; 4 26.

(2) In AV another word, māṣākh (RV uniformly "screen"), is distinguished from the preceding only by the singular, "hanging" (Ex 35 17; 38 18, etc). It is used of the screen or portière, embroidered in colors, that closed the entrance of the court (Ex 27 16; 35 17; 38 18; 39 40; 40 8.33; Nu 3 26; 4 26); of the screen of similar workmanship at the entrance of the tabernacle (Ex 26 36.37; 35 15; 36 37; 39 38; 40 5.28; Nu 3 25; 4 25); and once (Nu 3 31) of the tapestry veil, adorned with cherubim, at the entrance of the Holy of Holies (elsewhere, pārōkheth, "veil," Ex 26 31–33, etc, or pārōkheth ha-māṣākh, "veil of the screen," Ex 35 12, etc). In Nu 3 26, AV renders māṣākh "curtain," and in Ex 35 12; 39 34; 40 21 (cf also Nu 4 5), "covering."

(3) In 2 K 23 7 we read of "hangings" (Heb "houses") which the women wove for the Asherah. If the text is correct we are to think perhaps of tent shrines for the image of the goddess. Lucian's reading (stolás, "robes") is preferred by some, which would have reference to the custom of bringing offerings of clothing for the images of the gods. In 1 K 7 29 RV, "wreaths of hanging work" refers to a kind of ornamentation on the bases of the lavers. In Est 1 6, "hangings" is supplied by the translators. BENJAMIN RENO DOWNER

HANIEL, han′i-el. See HANNIEL.

HANNAH, han′a (חַנָּה, ḥannāh, "grace," "favor"; Ἄννα, Hánna): One of the two wives of Elkanah, an Ephraimite who lived at Ramathaim-zophim. Hannah visited Shiloh yearly with her husband to offer sacrifices, for there the tabernacle was located. She was greatly distressed because they had no children. She therefore prayed earnestly for a male child whom she promised to dedicate to the Lord from his birth. The prayer was heard, and she called her son's name Samuel ("God hears"). When he was weaned he was carried to Shiloh to be trained by Eli, the priest (1 S 1). Hannah became the mother of five other children, three sons and two daughters (2 2). Her devotion in sending Samuel a little robe every year is one of the tenderest recorded instances of maternal love (2 19). She was a prophetess of no ordinary talent, as is evident from her elevated poetic deliverance elicited by God's answer to her prayer (2 1–10). BYRON H. DEMENT

HANNATHON, han′a-thon (חַנָּתֹן, ḥannāthōn): A city on the northern boundary of Zebulun (Josh 19 14). It is probably identical with Kefar Hananyah, which the Mish gives as marking the northern limit of lower Galilee (Neubauer, Géog. du Talm, 179). It is represented by the modern Kefr ‘Anān, about 3 miles S.E. of er-Rāmeh.

HANNIEL, han′i-el (חַנִּיאֵל, ḥannī′ēl, "grace of God"):

(1) The son of Ephod and a prince of Manasseh who assisted in dividing Canaan among the tribes (Nu 34 23).

(2) A son of Ulla and a prince and hero of the tribe of Asher (1 Ch 7 39); AV "Haniel."

HANOCH, hā′nok, HANOCHITES, hā′nok-īts (חֲנוֹךְ, ḥănōkh, "initiation," "dedication"):

(1) A grandson of Abraham by Keturah, and an ancestral head of a clan of Midian (Gen 25 4; 1 Ch 1 33, AV "Henoch").

(2) The eldest son of Reuben (Gen 46 9; Ex 6 14; 1 Ch 5 3).

The descendants of Hanoch were known as Hanochites (Nu 26 5).

HANUN, hā′nun (חָנוּן, ḥānūn, "favored," "pitied"):

(1) A son and successor of Nahash, king of Ammon. Upon the death of Nahash, David sent sympathetic communications to Hanun, which were misinterpreted and the messengers dishonored. Because of this indignity, David waged a war against him, which caused the Ammonites to lose their independence (2 S 10 1 ff; 1 Ch 19 1 ff).

(2) One of the six sons of Zalaph who assisted in repairing the E. wall of Jerus (Neh 3 30).

(3) One of the inhabitants of Zanoah who repaired the Valley Gate in the wall of Jerus (Neh 3 13). BYRON H. DEMENT

HAP, hap, HAPLY, hap′li (מִקְרֶה, miḳreh, לוּ, lū; μήποτε, mḗpote):

Hap (a Saxon word for "luck, chance") is the tr of miḳreh, "a fortuitous chance," "a lot" (Ruth 2 3, AV "Her hap was to light on a part of the field belonging unto Boaz"); in 1 S 6 9, the same word is trd "chance" (that happened); "event," in Eccl 9 2.3, with "happeneth," in 2 14.

Haply (from "hap") is the tr of lū, "if that" (1 S 14 30, "if haply the people had eaten freely"); of ei ára, "if then" (Mk 11 13, "if haply he might find anything thereon"); of ei árage (Acts 17 27, "if haply they might feel after him"); of mēpote, "lest ever," "lest perhaps," etc (Lk 14 29; Acts 5 39); of mḗ pōs, "lest in any way" (2 Cor 9 4 AV, "lest haply," RV "lest by any means").

RV has "haply" for "at any time" (Mt 4 6; 5 25; 13 15; Mk 4 12; Lk 4 11; 21 34; He 2 1); introduces "haply" (Mt 7 6; 13 29; 15 32; 27 64; Mk 14 2; Lk 3 15; 12 58; 14 8.12; Acts 27 29; He 4 1); has "haply there shall be," for "lest there be" (He 3 12). W. L. WALKER

HAPHARAIM, haf-a-rā′im (חֲפָרַיִם, ḥăphārayim; AV Haphraim, haf-rā′im, possibly "place of a moat"): A town in the territory of Issachar, named with Shunem and Anaharath (Josh 19 19). Onom identifies it with "Affarea," and places it 6 miles N. of Legio-Megiddo. This position corresponds with that of the modern el-Ferrīyeh, an ancient site with remarkable tombs N.W. of el-Lejjūn.

HAPPEN, hap′′n (קָרָה, ḳārāh; συμβαίνω, sumbaínō): "Happen" (from "hap"), "to fall out," "befall," etc, "come to anyone," is the tr of ḳārāh, "to meet," etc (1 S 28 10, "There shall no punishment happen to thee," RVm "guilt come upon thee"; 2 S 1 6; Est 4 7; Eccl 2 14.15; 9 11 Isa 41 22); of ḳārā′, "to meet," "cause to happen," etc (2 S 20 1); of hāyāh, "to be" (1 S 6 9, "It was a chance that happened to us"); of nāgha‘, "to touch," "to come to" (Eccl 8 14 bis). In the NT it is in several instances the tr of sumbainō, "to go" or "come up together," "to happen" (Mk 10 32; Lk 24 14; Acts 3 10; 1 Cor 10 11; 1 Pet 4 12; 2 Pet 2 22); once of gínomai, "to become," "to happen" (Rom 11 25, RV "befallen"). "Happeneth" occurs (Eccl 2 15, "as it happeneth to the fool" [miḳreh]; 2 Esd 10 6; Bar 3 10 [tí estin]). RV supplies "that happened" for "were done" (Lk 24 35). See also CHANCE. W. L. WALKER

HAPPINESS, hap′i-nes. See BLESSEDNESS.

HAPPIZZEZ, hap′i-zez (הַפִּצֵּץ, ha-piççēç; AV Aphses): A priest on whom fell the lot for the 18th of the 24 courses which David appointed for the temple service (1 Ch 24 15).

HARA, hā′ra (הָרָא, hārā'; LXX omits): A place named in 1 Ch 5 26 along with Halah, Habor and the river of Gozan, whither the Reubenites, the Gadites and the half-tribe of Manasseh were carried by Tiglath-pileser. In 2 K 17 6; 18 11, Hara is omitted, and in both, "and in the cities of the Medes" is added. LXX renders ὄρη Μήδων, órē Mḗdōn, "the mountains of the Medes," which may represent Heb הָרֵי מָדַי, hārē mādhay, "mountains of Media," or, עָרֵי מָדַי, 'ārē mādhay, "cities of Media." The text seems to be corrupt. The second word may have fallen out in 1 Ch 5 26, hārē being changed to hārā'. W. Ewing

HARADAH, ha-rā′da, har′a-dä (חֲרָדָה, ḥărādhāh, "fearful"): A desert station of the Israelites between Mt. Shepher and Makheloth (Nu 33 24 25). See Wanderings of Israel.

HARAN, hā′ran (הָרָן, hārān):

(1) Son of Terah, younger brother of Abraham and Nahor, and father of Lot (Gen 11 27). He had two daughters, Milcah and Iscah (ver 29).

(2) A Gershonite, of the family of Shimei (1 Ch 23 9).

HARAN, hā′ran (חָרָן, ḥārān; Χαῤῥάν, Charhrán): The city where Terah settled on his departure from Ur (Gen 11 31 f); whence Abram set out on his pilgrimage of faith to Canaan (12 1 ff). It was probably "the city of Nahor" to which Abraham's servant came to find a wife for Isaac (24 10 ff). Hither came Jacob when he fled from Esau's anger (27 43). Here he met his bride (29 4), and in the neighboring pastures he tended the flocks of Laban. It is one of the cities named by Rabshakeh as destroyed by the king of Assyria (2 K 19 12; Isa 37 12). Ezekiel speaks of the merchants of Haran as trading with Tyre (27 23).

The name appears in Assyro-Bab as Ḥarran, which means "road"; possibly because here the trade route from Damascus joined that from Nineveh to Carchemish. It is mentioned in the prism inscription of Tiglath-pileser I. It was a seat of the worship of Sin, the moon-god, from very ancient times. A temple was built by Shalmaneser II. Haran seems to have shared in the rebellion of Assur (763 BC, the year of the solar eclipse, June 15). The privileges then lost were restored by Sargon II. The temple, which had been destroyed, was rebuilt by Ashurbanipal, who was here crowned with the crown of Sin. Haran and the temple suffered much damage in the invasion of the Umman-Manda (the Medes). Nabuna'id restored temple and city, adorning them on a lavish scale. Near Haran the Parthians defeated and slew Crassus (53 BC), and here Caracalla was assassinated (217 AD). In the 4th cent. it was the seat of a bishopric; but the cult of the moon persisted far into the Christian centuries. The chief temple was the scene of heathen worship until the 11th cent., and was destroyed by the Mongols in the 13th.

The ancient city is represented by the modern Ḥarrān to the S.E. of Edessa, on the river Belias, an affluent of the Euphrates. The ruins lie on both sides of the stream, and include those of a very ancient castle, built of great basaltic blocks, with square columns, 8 ft. thick, which support an arched roof some 30 ft. in height. Remains of the old cathedral are also conspicuous. No inscriptions have yet been found here, but a fragment of an Assyr lion has been uncovered. A well nearby is identified as that where Eliezer met Rebekah.

In Acts 7 2.4, AV gives the name as Charran.

HARARITE, hā′ra-rīt (הַהֲרָרִי, ha-hărārī, or הָאֲרָרִי, hā-'ărārī): Lit. "mountaineer," more particularly an inhabitant of the hill country of Judah. Thus used of two heroes:

(1) Shammah, the son of Agee (2 S 23 11.33). The ‖ passage, 1 Ch 11 34, has "Shage" in place of "Shammah."

(2) Ahiam, the son of Sharar the Ararite (2 S 23 33). In 1 Ch 11 35, "Sacar" for Sharar as here.

HARBONA, HARBONAH, här-bō′na (חַרְבוֹנָא, ḥarᵉbhōnā', חַרְבוֹנָה, ḥarᵉbhōnāh): One of the seven eunuchs who served Ahasuerus and to whom was given the command to bring Queen Esther before the king (Est 1 10). It was he who suggested that Haman be hanged upon the self-same gallows that he had erected for Mordecai (7 9). Jewish tradition has it that Harbona had originally been a confederate of Haman, but, upon noting the failure of the latter's plans, abandoned him. The Pers equivalent of the name means "donkey-driver."

HARBOUR, här′bẽr. Used figuratively of God in Joel 3 16 AVm, "Heb, place of repair. or, harbour" (AV "hope," RV "refuge"). See Haven; Ships and Boats, I, II, (1), II, 3.

HARD, härd, HARDINESS, här′di-nes, HARDNESS, härd′nes, HARDLY, härd′li (קָשֶׁה, ḳāsheh, פָּלָא, pālā'; σκληρός, sklērós): The senses in which hard is used may be distinguished as:

(1) "Firm," "stiff," opposite to soft: Job 41 24, yāçaḳ, "to be firm," "his heart . . . . as hard as a piece of the nether millstone," RV "firm"; Ezk 3 7, ḳāsheh, "sharp," "hard of heart"; ḥāzāḳ, "firm," "As an adamant harder than flint have I made thy forehead"; Jer 5 3, "They have made their faces harder than a rock"; Prov 21 29, 'āzaz, "to make strong," "hard," "impudent," "a wicked man hardeneth his face"; Prov 13 15 probably belongs here also where 'ēthān is trd "hard": "The way of the transgressor is hard," ERV "The way of the treacherous is rugged"; the Heb word means, "lasting," "firm," poet. "rocks" (the earth's foundations, Mic 6 2), and the meaning seems to be, not that the way (path) of transgressors, or the treacherous (Delitzsch has "uncultivated"), is hard (rocky) to them, but that their way, or mode of acting, is hard, unsympathetic, unkind, "destitute of feeling in things which, as we say, would soften a stone" (Delitzsch on passage); also Mt 25 24, sklēros, "stiff," "thou art a hard man"; Wisd 11 4, sklēros, "hard stone," RV "flinty rock," m "the steep rock."

(2) "Sore," "trying," "painful," ḳāsheh (Ex 1 14, "hard service"; Dt 26 6; 2 S 3 39; Ps 60 3; Isa 14 3); ḳāshāh, "to have it hard" (Gen 35 16.17; Dt 15 18); 'āthāḳ, "stiff" (Ps 94 4 AV, "They utter and speak hard things"); sklēros (Jn 6 60, "This is a hard saying"—hard to accept, hard in its nature; Acts 9 5 AV; 26 14; Jude ver 15, "hard speeches"; Wisd 19 13).

(3) "Heavy," "pressing hard," kābhēdh, "weighty" (Ezk 3 5.6, "a people of a strange speech and of a hard language," RVm "Heb deep of lip and heavy of tongue"); ṣāmakh, "to lay" (Ps 88 7, "Thy wrath lieth hard upon me").

(4) "Difficult," "hard to do," "know," etc, pālā', "difficult to be done" (Gen 18 14, "Is anything too hard for Jeh?"; Jer 32 17.27; Dt 17 8; 2 S 13 2); ḳāsheh (Ex 18 26, "hard causes"); ḳāshāh (Dt 1 17; 2 K 2 10); ḥīdhāh, "something twisted," “involved,” “an enigma”; cf Jgs 14 14 (1 K 10 1; 2 Ch 9 1, “to prove Solomon with hard questions”); 'ăhīdhān, Aram. (Dnl 5 12); dúskolos, lit. “difficult about food,” “hard to please,” hence “difficult to accomplish” (Mk 10 24, “How hard is it for them that trust in riches to enter into the kingdom of God”); dusnóētos, “hard to be understood” (He 5 11; 2 Pet 3 16; cf Ecclus 3 21, “things too hard for thee,” chalepós).

(5) “Close,” or “near to” (hard by), nāghash, “to come nigh” (Jgs 9 52, ARV “near”); dābhāḳ and dābhēḳ, “to follow hard after” (Jgs 20 45; Ps 63 8, etc); 'ēçel, “near” (1 K 21 1); l^e'ummath, “over against” (Lev 3 9); 'adh, “to” “even to” (1 Ch 19 4, AV “hard by,” RV “even to”).

Hardiness occurs in Jth 16 10 (thrásos), RV “boldness.”

Hardness is the tr of mūçāḳ, “something poured out,” “dust wetted,” “running into clods” (Job 38 38), RV “runneth into a mass”; “hardness of heart” occurs in the Gospels; in Mk 3 5, it is pṓrōsis, “hardness,” “callousness”; Mt 19 8; Mk 10 5; 16 14, sklērokardía, “dryness,” “stiffness of heart”; cf Ecclus 16 10; in Rom 2 5, it is sklērótēs; in 2 Tim 2 3 AV we have, “Endure hardness, as a good soldier of Jesus Christ,” RV “Suffer hardship with me” (corrected text), m “Take thy part in suffering hardship” (kakopathéō, “to suffer evil”).

Hardly occurs in the OT (Ex 13 15), “Pharaoh would hardly let us go,” ḳāshāh, lit. “hardened to let us go,” RVm “hardened himself against letting us go”; “hardly bestead” (Isa 8 21) is the tr of ḳāshāh, ARV “sore distressed.” In the NT “hardly” is the tr of duskólōs, “hard to please,” “difficult,” meaning not scarcely or barely, but with difficulty (Mt 19 23, “A rich man shall hardly enter into the kingdom of heaven,” RV “it is hard for”; Mk 10 23; Lk 18 24, “how hardly” [“with what difficulty”]); of mógis, “with labor,” “pain,” “trouble” (Lk 9 39, “hardly departeth from him” [“painfully”]); of mólis “with toil and fatigue” (Acts 27 8, RV “with difficulty”; Wisd 9 16, “Hardly do we guess aright at things that are upon earth”; Ecclus 26 29, “A merchant shall hardly keep himself from wrong doing”; 29 6, “He shall hardly receive the half,” in each instance the word is molis, but in the last two instances we seem to see the transition to “scarcely”; cf also Ex 13 15).

RV has “too hard” for “hidden” (Dt 30 11, m “wonderful”); “hardness” for “boldness” (of face) (Eccl 8 1); for “sorrow” (Lam 3 65); “deal hardly with me” for “make yourselves strong to me” (Job 19 3); omits “It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks” (Acts 9 5, corrected text); “hardship” for “trouble” (2 Tim 2 9).

HARDEN, här'd'n (חָזַק, ḥāzaḳ, קָשָׁה, ḳāshāh; σκληρύνω, sklērúnō):

(1) “Harden” occurs most frequently in the phrase “to harden the heart,” or “the neck.” This hardening of men's hearts is attributed both to God and to men themselves, e.g. with reference to the hearts of Pharaoh and the Egyptians; the Hiphil of ḥāzaḳ, “to make strong,” is frequently used in this connection (Ex 4 21, “I will harden his heart,” RVm “Heb make strong”; 7 13, “And he hardened P.'s heart,” RV “was hardened,” m “Heb was strong”; 7 22; 8 19; 9 12; 10 20.27, etc; 14 17, “I will harden the hearts of the Egyptians,” RVm “Heb make strong”; cf Josh 11 20); ḳāshāh, “to be heavy,” “to make hard” (Ex 7 3); kābhēdh, “heavy,” “slow,” “hard,” not easily moved (Ex 10 1, RVm “Heb made heavy”). When the hardening is attributed to man's own act kābhēdh is generally used (Ex 8 15, “He hardened his heart, and hearkened not,” RVm “Heb made heavy”; 8 32, “Pharaoh hardened his heart” [RVm as before]; 9 7.34; 1 S 6 6 bis). The “hardening” of men's hearts by God is in the way of punishment, but it is always a consequence of their own self-hardening. In Pharaoh's case we read that “he hardened his heart” against the appeal to free the Israelites; so hardening himself, he became always more confirmed in his obstinacy, till he brought the final doom upon himself. This is how sin is made to become its own punishment. It was not confined to Pharaoh and the Egyptians, nor does it belong to the past only. As St. Paul says (Rom 9 18), “Whom he will he hardeneth” (sklērunō); 11 7, “The election obtained it, and the rest were hardened” (RV and AVm, pōróō, “to make hard” or “callous”); ver 25, a “Hardening in part hath befallen Israel” (pṓrōsis); cf Jn 12 40 (from Isa 6 10), “He hath blinded their eyes, and he hardened their heart”; Isa 63 17, “O Jeh, why dost thou make us to err from thy ways, and hardenest our heart from thy fear?” (ḳāshaḥ, “to harden”); cf on the other side, as expressing the human blameworthiness, Job 9 4, “Who hath hardened himself against him, and prospered?” Mk 3 5, “being grieved at the hardening of their heart”; 6 52, “Their heart was hardened”; Rom 2 5, “after thy hardness and impenitent heart.” In Heb religious thought everything was directly attributed to God, and the hardening is God's work, in His physical and ethical constitution and laws of man's nature; but it is always the consequence of human action out of harmony therewith. Other instances of sklērunō are in Acts 19 9; He 3 8.13. 15; 4 7.

(2) “Harden” in the sense of “to fortify one's self” (make one's self hard) is the tr of ṣāladh, “to leap,” “exult” (Job 6 10 AV, “I would harden myself in sorrow,” RV “Let me exult in pain,” m “harden myself”).

(3) In Prov 21 29 “harden” has the meaning of “boldness,” “defiance” or “shamelessness” (brazen-faced); 'āzaz, Hiphil, “to strengthen one's countenance,” “A wicked man hardeneth his face”; Delitzsch, “A godless man showeth boldness in his mien”; cf 7 13; Eccl 8 1; see also HARD.

For “harden” RV has “stubborn” (Ex 7 14; 9 7, m “heavy”); “hardenest” (Isa 63 17); “made stiff” (Jer 7 26; 19 15); for “is hardened” (Job 39 16, ARV “dealeth hardly,” and ERVm); “at the hardening” instead of “for the hardness” (Mk 3 5); “hardening” for “blindness” (Eph 4 18).

HARDLY, HARDNESS. See HARD.

HARD SAYINGS, sā'ingz; HARD SENTENCES, sen'ten-siz: In Dnl 5 12 AV (Aram. אֲחִידָן, 'ăḥīdhān), RV “dark sentences,” of enigmatic utterances which preternatural wisdom was needed to interpret; in Jn 6 60 (σκληρός . . . . ὁ λόγος, sklērós . . . . ho lógos), of sayings (Christ's words at Capernaum about eating His flesh and drinking His blood) difficult for the natural mind to understand (cf ver 52).

HARE, hâr (אַרְנֶבֶת, 'arnebheth [Lev 11 6; Dt 14 7]; cf Arab. أَرْنَب, 'arnab, “hare”): This animal is mentioned only in the lists of unclean animals in Lev and Dt, where it occurs along with the camel, the coney and the swine. The camel, the hare and the coney are unclean, ‘because they chew the cud but part not the hoof,’ the swine, “because he parteth the hoof . . . . but cheweth not the cud.” The hare and the coney are not ruminants, but might be supposed to be from their habit of almost continually moving their jaws. Both are freely eaten by the Arabs. Although 'arnebheth occurs only in the two places cited, there is no doubt that it is the hare. LXX has δασύπους, dasúpous, "rough-footed," which, while not the commonest Gr word (λαγῶς, lagôs), refers to the remarkable fact that in hares and rabbits the soles of the feet are densely covered with hair. 'Arnab, which is the common Arab. word for "hare," is from the same root as the Heb 'arnebheth.

Lev 11 4–7: ver 4, EV "camel"; LXX τὸν κάμηλον, tón kámēlon; Vulg camelus; Heb הַגָּמָל, ha-gāmāl. Ver 5, EV "coney"; LXX τὸν δασύποδα, tón dasúpoda; Vulg choerogryllus; Heb הַשָּׁפָן, ha-shāphān. Ver 6, EV "hare"; LXX τὸν χοιρογρύλλιον, tón choirogrúllion; Vulg lepus; Heb הָאַרְנֶבֶת, ha-'arnebheth. Ver 7, EV "swine"; LXX τὸν ὗν, tón hún; Vulg sus; Heb הַחֲזִיר, ha-ḥăzir.

Dt 14 7: EV "camel"; LXX τὸν κάμηλον; Vulg camelum; Heb הַגָּמָל; EV "hare"; LXX δασύποδα; Vulg leporem; Heb הָאַרְנֶבֶת; EV "coney"; LXX χοιρογρύλλιον; Vulg choerogryllum; Heb הַשָּׁפָן.

Dt 14 8: EV "swine"; LXX τὸν ὗν; Vulg sus; Heb הַחֲזִיר.

It is evident from the above and from the meanings of δασύπους and χοιρογρύλλιος as given in Liddell and Scott, that the order of LXX in Lev 11 5.6 does not follow the Heb, but has apparently assimilated the order of that of Dt 14 7.8. In Ps 104 18, LXX has χοιρογρύλλιος for שָׁפָן; also in Prov 30 26.

As the word "coney," which properly means "rabbit," has been applied to the hyrax, so, in America at least, the word "rabbit" is widely used for various species of hare, e.g. the gray rabbit and the jack-rabbit, both of which are hares. Hares have longer legs and ears and are swifter than rabbits. Their young are hairy and have their eyes open, while rabbits are born naked and blind. Hares are widely distributed in the Northern Hemisphere, and there is one species in South America. Rabbits are apparently native to the Western Mediterranean countries, although they have been distributed by man all over the world.

Lepus syriacus, the common hare of Syria and Pal, differs somewhat from the European hare. Lepus judeae is cited by Tristram from Northeastern Pal, and he also notes three other species from the extreme south. ALFRED ELY DAY

HAREPH, hā'ref (חָרֵף, ḥārēph, "scornful"): A chief of Judah, one of the sons of Caleb and father of Beth-gader (1 Ch 2 51). A quite similar name, Hariph, occurs in Neh 7 24; 10 19, but it is probably that of another individual.

HARETH, hā'reth (חָרֶת, ḥāreth, in pause). See HERETH.

HARHAIAH, här-hā'ya (חַרְהֲיָה, ḥarhăyāh, "Jeh protects"): A goldsmith, whose son, Uzziel, helped to repair the walls of Jerus under Zerubbabel (Neh 3 8).

HARHAS, här'has (חַרְחַס, ḥarḥaṣ, "splendor"): Grandfather of Shallum, husband of Huldah (2 K 22 14). Name given as "Hasrah" in ‖ passage (2 Ch 34 22).

HARHUR, här'hur (חַרְחוּר, ḥarḥur, "free-born" or "fever"; Ἁσουρ, Hásour): One of the Nethinim whose descendants came from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 51; Neh 7 53; 1 Esd 5 31).

HARIM, hā'rim (חָרִם, ḥārim): A family name.

(1) A non-priestly family that returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 32; Neh 7 35); mentioned among those who married foreign wives (Ezr 10 31); also mentioned among those who renewed the covenant (Neh 10 27).

(2) A priestly family returning with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 39; Neh 7 42; 12 3.15 [see REHUM]); members of this family covenanted to put away their foreign wives (Ezr 10 21; Neh 10 5). A family of this name appears as the third of the priestly courses in the days of David and Solomon (1 Ch 24 8).

(3) In Neh 3 11 is mentioned Malchijah, son of Harim, one of the wall-builders. Which family is here designated is uncertain. W. N. STEARNS

HARIPH, hā'rif (חָרִיף, ḥarīph, חָרִף, ḥariph): One of those who returned from exile under Zerubbabel and helped to seal the covenant under Nehemiah and Ezra (Neh 7 24; 10 19 [20]). Ezr 2 18 has "Jorah."

HARLOT, här'lot: This name replaces in RV "whore" of AV. It stands for several words and phrases used to designate or describe the unchaste woman, married or unmarried, e.g. זוֹנָה, zōnāh, אִשָּׁה נָכְרִיָּה, 'ishshāh nokhrīyāh, קְדֵשָׁה, ḳedhēshāh; LXX and NT πόρνη, pórnē. πορνεία, porneía is used chiefly of prenuptial immorality, but the married woman guilty of sexual immorality is said to be guilty of porneia (Mt 5 32; 19 9; cf Am 7 17 LXX). These and cognate words are applied esp. in the OT to those devoted to immoral service in idol sanctuaries, or given over to a dissolute life for gain. Such a class existed among all ancient peoples, and may be traced in the history of Israel. Evidence of its existence in very early times is found (Gen 38). It grew out of conditions, sexual and social, which were universal. After the corrupting foreign influxes and influences of Solomon's day, it developed to even fuller shamelessness, and its voluptuous songs (Isa 23 16), seductive arts (Prov 6 24), and blighting influence are vividly pictured and denounced by the prophets (Prov 7 10; 29 3; Isa 23 16; Jer 3 3; 5 7; Ezk 16 25; cf Dt 23 17). Money was lavished upon women of this class, and the weak and unwary were taken captive by them, so that it became one of the chief concerns of the devout father in Israel to "keep [his son] from the evil woman," who "hunteth for the precious life" (Prov 6 24.26). From the title given her in Prov, a "foreign woman" (23 27), and the warnings against "the flattery of the foreigner's tongue" (6 24; cf 1 K 11 1; Ezr 10 2), we may infer that in later times this class was chiefly made up of strangers from without. The whole subject must be viewed in the setting of the times. Even in Israel, then, apart from breaches of marriage vows, immoral relations between the sexes were deemed venial (Dt 22 28 f). A man was forbidden to compel his daughter to sin (Lev 19 29), to "profane [her] and make her a harlot," but she was apparently left free to take that way herself (cf Gen 38). The children of the harlot, though, were outlawed (Dt 23 2), and later the harlot is found under the sternest social ban (Mt 21 31.32).

The subject takes on even a darker hue when viewed in the light of the hideous conditions that prevailed in ancient Syria affecting this practice. The harlot represented more than a social peril and problem. She was a ḳedhēshāh, one of a consecrated class, and as such was the concrete expression and agent of the most insidious and powerful influence and system menacing the purity and permanence of the religion of Jeh. This system deified the reproductive organs and forces of Nature and its devotees worshipped their idol symbols in grossly licentious rites and orgies. The temple prostitute was invested with sanctity as a member of the religious caste, as she is today in India. Men and women thus prostituted themselves in the service of their gods. The Canaanite sanctuaries were gigantic brothels, legalized under the sanctions of religion. For a time, therefore, the supreme religious question was whether such a cult should be established and allowed to naturalize itself in Israel, as it had done in Babylon (Herod. i.199) and in Greece (Strabo viii.6). That the appeal thus made to the baser passions of the Israelites was all too successful is sadly clear (Am 2 7; Hos 4 13 ff). The prophets give vivid pictures of the syncretizing of the worship of Baal and Astarte with that of Jeh and the extent to which the local sanctuaries were given over to this form of corruption. They denounced it as the height of impiety and as sure to provoke Divine judgments. Asa and Jehoshaphat undertook to purge the land of such vile abominations (1 K 14 24; 15 12; 22 46). The Dt code required that all such "paramours" be banished, and forbade the use of their unholy gains as temple revenue (Dt 23 17.18, Driver's note). The Lev law forbade a priest to take a harlot to wife (Lev 21 7), and commanded that the daughter of a priest who played the harlot should be burned (21 9). See ASHTORETH; IMAGES; IDOLATRY.

It is grimly significant that the prophets denounce spiritual apostasy as "harlotry" (AV "whoredom"). But it would seem that the true ethical attitude toward prostitution was unattainable so long as marriage was in the low, transitional stage mirrored in the OT; though the religion of Jeh was in a measure delivered from the threatened peril by the fiery discipline of the exile.

In NT times, a kindred danger beset the followers of Christ, esp. in Greece and Asia Minor (Acts 15 20.29; Rom 1 24 ff; 1 Cor 6 9 ff; Gal 5 19). That lax views of sexual morality were widely prevalent in the generation in which Christ lived is evident both from His casual references to the subject and from His specific teaching in answer to questions concerning adultery and divorce (cf Jos, Ant, IV, viii, 23; Vita, § 76; Sir 7 26; 25 26; 42 9, and the Talm). The ideas of the times were debased by the prevalent polygamous customs, "it being of old permitted to the Jews to marry many wives" (Jos, BJ, I, xxiv, 2; cf Ant, XVII, i, 2). The teaching of Jesus was in sharp contrast with the low ideals and the rabbinical teaching of the times. The controversy on this question waxed hot between the two famous rival rabbinical schools. Hillel reduced adultery to the level of the minor faults. Shammai opposed his teaching as immoral in tendency. Κατὰ πᾶσαν αἰτίαν, katá pā́san aitían (Mt 19 3), gives incidental evidence of the nature of the controversy. It was characteristic of the teaching of Jesus that He went to the root of the matter, making this sin to consist in "looking on a woman to lust after her." Nor did He confine Himself to the case of the married. The general character of the terms in Mt 5 28, πᾶς ὁ βλέπων, pás ho blépōn, forbids the idea that γυναῖκα, gunaíka, and ἐμοίχευσεν, emoícheusen, are to be limited to post-nuptial sin with a married woman. On the other hand it is a characteristic part of the work of Jesus to rescue the erring woman from the merciless clutches of the Pharisaic tribunal, and to bring her within the pale of mercy and redemption (Mt 21 31.32). He everywhere leaned to the side of mercy in dealing with such cases, as is indicated by the traditional and doubtless true narrative found in the accepted text of the Fourth Gospel (Jn 7 53—8 11). HARLOTRY, här′lot-ri. See CRIMES.

HAR-MAGEDON, här-ma-ged′on (Ἁρμαγεδών, Harmagedōn from Heb har mᵉghiddō, "Mount of Megiddo"; AV Armageddon): This name is found only in Rev 16 16. It is described as the rallying-place of the kings of the whole world who, led by the unclean spirits issuing from the mouth of the dragon, the beast and the false prophet, assemble here for "the war of the great day of God, the Almighty." Various explanations have been suggested; but, as Nestle says (HDB, s.v), "Upon the whole, to find an allusion here to Megiddo is still the most probable explanation." In the history of Israel it had been the scene of never-to-be-forgotten battles. Here took place the fatal struggle between Josiah and Pharaoh-necoh (2 K 23 29; 2 Ch 35 22). Long before, the hosts of Israel had won glory here, in the splendid victory over Sisera and his host (Jgs 5 19). These low hills around Megiddo, with their outlook over the plain of Esdraelon, have witnessed perhaps a greater number of bloody encounters than have ever stained a like area of the world's surface. There was, therefore, a peculiar appropriateness in the choice of this as the arena of the last mighty struggle between the powers of good and evil. The choice of the hill as the battlefield has been criticized, as it is less suitable for military operations than the plain. But the thought of Gilboa and Tabor and the uplands beyond Jordan might have reminded the critics that Israel was not unaccustomed to mountain warfare. Megiddo itself was a hill-town, and the district was in part mountainous (cf Mt. Tabor, Jgs 4 6.12; "the high places of the field," 5 18). It will be remembered that this is apocalypse. Har-Magedon may stand for the battlefield without indicating any particular locality. The attempt of certain scholars to connect the name with "the mount of congregation" in Isa 14 13 (Hommel, Genkel, etc), and with Bab mythology, cannot be pronounced successful. Ewald (Die Johan. Schrift, II, 204) found that the Heb forms of "Har-Magedon" and "the great Rome" have the same numerical value—304. The historical persons alluded to in the passage do not concern us here. W. EWING

HARNEPHER, här′nē̇-fẽr, här-nē′fẽr (חַרְנֶפֶר, ḥarnepher): A member of the tribe of Asher (1 Ch 7 36).

HARNESS, här′nes: A word of Celtic origin meaning "armour" in AV; it is the tr of shiryān, "a coat of mail" (1 K 22 34; 2 Ch 18 33); of neshek, "arms," "weapons" (2 Ch 9 24, RV "armor"); of 'āṣar "to bind" (Jer 46 4), "harness the horses," probably here, "yoke the horses"; cf 1 S 6 7, "tie the kine to the cart" (bind them), Gen 46 29; another rendering is "put on their accoutrements"; cf 1 Macc 6 43, "one of the beasts armed with royal harness" (θώραξ, thōrax), RV "breastplates"; cf 1 Macc 3 3, "warlike harness"; 6 41 (ὅπλα, hópla), RV "arms"; 2 Macc 3 25, etc; harnessed represents ḥămushīm, "armed," "girded" (Ex 13 18, "The children of Israel went up harnessed," RV "armed"). Tindale, Cranmer, Geneva have "harnes" in Lk 11 22, Wiclif "armer."

HAROD, hā′rod, WELL OF (עֵין חֲרֹד, 'ēn ḥărōdh, "fountain of trembling"): The fountain beside which (probably above it) Gideon and his army were encamped (Jgs 7 1). Moore (Judges, in loc.) argues, inconclusively, that the hill Moreh must be sought near Shechem, and that the well of Harod must be some spring in the neighborhood of that city. There is no good reason to question the accuracy of the common view which places this spring at 'Ain Jalūd, on the edge of the vale of Jezreel, about 2 miles E. of Zer'īn, and just under the northern cliffs of Gilboa. A copious spring of clear cold water rises in a rocky cave and flows out into a large pool, whence it drains off, in Nahr Jalūd, down the vale past Beisān to the Jordan. This is probably also to be identified with the spring "which is in Jezreel," i.e. in the district, near which Saul encamped before the battle of Gilboa (1 S 29 1). 'Ain el-Meiyiteh, just below Zer'īn on the N., is hardly of sufficient size and importance to be a rival to 'Ain Jalūd. See ESDRAELON.

HARODITE, hā′rod-īt (חֲרֹדִי, ḥărōdhī): Two of David's heroes, Shamma and Elika, are so called (2 S 23 25). LXX omits the second name. In 1 Ch 11 27, the first is called "Shammoth the Harorite," while the second is omitted. "Harorite" is a clerical error for "Harodite," ד being taken for ר. Possibly Harodite may be connected with the well of Harod (q.v.).

HAROEH, ha-rō′e (הָרֹאֶה, hā-rō'eh, "the seer"): A Judahite (1 Ch 2 52).

HARORITE, hā′rō̇-rīt. See Harodite.

HAROSHETH, ha-rō′sheth, OF THE GENTILES, or OF THE NATIONS (חֲרֹשֶׁת הַגּוֹיִם, ḥărōsheth ha-gōyīm): There is now no means of discovering what is meant by the phrase "of the nations." This is the place whence Sisera led his hosts to the Kishon against Deborah and Barak (Jgs 4 13), to which the discomfited and leaderless army fled after their defeat (ver 16). No site seems so well to meet the requirements of the narrative as el Ḥarithīyeh. There are still the remains of an ancient stronghold on this great double mound, which rises on the N. bank of the Kishon, in the throat of the pass leading by the base of Carmel, from the coast to Esdraelon. It effectually commands the road which here climbs the slope, and winds through the oak forest to the plain; Megiddo being some 16 miles distant. The modern also preserves a reminiscence of the ancient name. By emending the text, Cheyne would here find the name "Kadshon," to be identified with Kedesh in Galilee (EB, s.v.). On any reasonable reading of the narrative this is unnecessary. W. Ewing

HARP, härp. See Music.

HARROW, har′ō (שָׂדַד, sādhadh): Sādhadh occurs in 3 passages (Job 39 10; Isa 28 24; Hos 10 11). In the first 2 it is trd "harrow," in the last "break the clods." That this was a separate operation from plowing, and that it was performed with an instrument drawn by animals, seems certain. As to whether it corresponded to our modern harrowing is a question. The reasons for this uncertainty are: (1) the ancient Egyptians have left no records of its use; (2) at the present time, in those parts of Pal and Syria where foreign methods have not been introduced, harrowing is not commonly known, although the writer has been told that in some districts the ground is leveled after plowing with the threshing-sledge or a log drawn by oxen. Cross-plowing is resorted to for breaking up the lumpy soil, esp. where the ground has been baked during the long rainless summer. Lumps not reduced in this way are further broken up with a hoe or pick. Seed is always sown before plowing, so that harrowing to cover the seed is unnecessary. See Agriculture. Fig. used of affliction, discipline, etc (Isa 28 24). James A. Patch

HARROWS, har′ōz (חָרִיץ, ḥārīç): Ḥārīç has no connection with the vb. trd "harrows." The context seems to indicate some form of pointed instrument (2 S 12 31; 1 Ch 20 3; see esp. RVm).

HARSHA, här′sha (חַרְשָׁא, ḥarshā'): Head of one of the families of the Nethinim (Ezr 2 52; Neh 7 54); 1 Esd 5 32, "Charea."

HARSITH, här′sith (חַרְסִית, ḥarṣīth): One of the gates of Jerus (Jer 19 2 RV); m suggests "gate of the potsherds"; AV has "east gate" and AVm "sun gate," both deriving the name from חֶרֶס, ḥereṣ, "sun." The gate opened into the valley of Hinnom. See Jerusalem; Potsherd.

HART, härt. See Deer.

HARUM, hā′rum, hâr′um (חָרֻם, ḥārum): A Judahite (1 Ch 4 8).

HARUMAPH, ha-rōō′maf (חֲרוּמַף, ḥărūmaph): Father of Jedaiah who assisted in repairing the walls of Jerus under Nehemiah (Neh 3 10).

HARUPHITE, ha-rōō′fīt (חֲרוּפִי, ḥărūphī, or חֲרִיפִי, ḥărīphī); In 1 Ch 12 5 Shephatiah, one of the companions of David, is called a Haruphite (K) or Hariphite (Q). If the latter be the correct reading, it is connected with Hariph or perhaps Hareph (q.v.).

HARUZ, hā′ruz (חָרוּץ, ḥārūç): Father of Meshullemeth, the mother of Amon, king of Judah (2 K 21 19).

HARVEST, här′vest (קָצִיר, ḳāçīr; θερισμός, therismós): To many of us, harvest time is of little concern, because in our complex life we are far removed from the actual production of our food supplies, but for the Heb people, as for those in any agricultural district today, the harvest was a most important season (Gen 8 22; 45 6). Events were reckoned from harvests (Gen 30 14; Josh 3 15; Jgs 15 1; Ruth 1 22; 2 23; 1 S 6 13; 2 S 21 9; 23 13). The three principal feasts of the Jews corresponded to the three harvest seasons (Ex 23 16; 34 21.22); (1) the feast of the Passover in April at the time of the barley harvest (cf Ruth 1 22); (2) the feast of Pentecost (7 weeks later) at the wheat harvest (Ex 34 22), and (3) the feast of Tabernacles at the end of the year (October) during the fruit harvest. The seasons have not changed since that time. Between the reaping of the barley in April and the wheat in June, most of the other cereals are reaped. The grapes begin to ripen in August, but the gathering in for making wine and molasses (dibs), and the storing of the dried figs and raisins, is at the end of September. Between the barley harvest in April and the wheat harvest, only a few showers fall, which are welcomed because they increase the yield of wheat (cf Am 4 7). Samuel made use of the unusual occurrence of rain during the wheat harvest to strike fear into the hearts of the people (1 S 12 17). Such an unusual storm of excessive violence visited Syria in 1912, and did much damage to the harvests, bringing fear to the superstitious farmers, who thought some greater disaster awaited them. From the wheat harvest until the fruit harvest no rain falls (2 S 21 10; Jer 5 24; cf Prov 26 1). The harvesters long for cool weather during the reaping season (cf Prov 25 13).

Many definite laws were instituted regarding the harvest. Gleaning was forbidden (Lev 19 9; 23 22; Dt 24 19) (see Gleaning). The first-fruits were required to be presented to Jeh (Lev 23 10). In Syria the Christians still celebrate 'id er-rubb ("feast of the Lord"), at which time the owners of the vineyards bring their first bunches of grapes to the church. The children of Israel were enjoined to reap no harvest for which they had not labored (Lev 25 5). In Prov the ants' harvesting is mentioned as a lesson for the sluggard (Prov 6 8; 10 5; 20 4).

Figurative: A destroyed harvest typified devastation or affliction (Job 5 5; Isa 16 9; 17 11; Jer 5 17; 50 16). The "time of harvest," in the OT frequently meant the day of destruction (Jer 51 33; Hos 6 11; Joel 3 13). "Joy in harvest" typified great joy (Isa 9 3); "harvest of the Nile," an abundant harvest (Isa 23 3). "The harvest is past" meant that the appointed time was gone (Jer 8 20). Jeh chose the most promising time to cut off the wicked, namely, "when there is a cloud of dew in the heat of harvest" (Isa 18 4.5). This occurrence of hot misty days just before the ripening of the grapes is still common. They are welcome because they are supposed to hasten the harvest. The Syrian farmers in some districts call it et-tabbakh el 'ainib wa tîn ("the fireplace of the grapes and figs").

In the Gospels, Jesus frequently refers to the harvest of souls (Mt 9 37.38 bis; 13 30 bis.39; Mk 4 29; Jn 4 35 bis). In explaining the parable of the Tares he said, "The harvest is the end of the world" (Mt 13 39; cf Rev 14 15). See also Agriculture. James A. Patch

HASADIAH, has-a-dī'a (חֲסַדְיָה, ḥăṣadhyāh, "Jeh is kind"): A son of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3 20). In Bar 1 1 the Gr is Asadías.

HASENUAH, has-e-nū'a (הַסְּנֻאָה, haṣṣᵉnu'āh): In AV (1 Ch 9 7) for Hassenuah (q.v.).

HASHABIAH, hash-a-bī'a (חֲשַׁבְיָה, ḥăshabhyāh):

(1) Two Levites of the family of Merari (1 Ch 6 45; 9 14).

(2) A Levite who dwelt in Jerus at the time of Nehemiah (Neh 11 15).

(3) A son of Jeduthun (1 Ch 25 3).

(4) A Hebronite, chief of a clan of warriors who had charge of West Jordan in the interests of Jeh and the king of Israel (1 Ch 26 30).

(5) A Levite who was a "ruler" (1 Ch 27 17).

(6) One of the Levite chiefs in the time of Josiah, who gave liberally toward the sacrifices (2 Ch 35 9). In 1 Esd 1 9 it is "Sabias."

(7) A Levite whom Ezra induced to return from exile with him (Ezr 8 19). 1 Esd 8 48 has "Asebias."

(8) One of the twelve priests set apart by Ezra to take care of the gold, the silver, and the vessels of the temple on their return from exile (Ezr 8 24; 1 Esd 8 54, "Assamias").

(9) Ruler of half of the district of "Keilah," who helped to repair the walls under Nehemiah (Neh 3 17), and also helped to seal the covenant (Neh 10 11; 12 24).

(10) A Levite (Neh 11 22).

(11) A priest (Neh 12 21). J. J. Reeve

HASHABNAH, ha-shab'na (חֲשַׁבְנָה, ḥăshabhnāh): One who helped to seal the covenant under Nehemiah (Neh 10 25).

HASHABNEIAH, hash-ab-nḗ-ī'a (חֲשַׁבְנְיָה, ḥăshabhnᵉyāh; AV Hashabniah, hash-ab-nī'a).

(1) Father of one of the builders of the wall (Neh 3 10).

(2) A Levite mentioned in connection with the prayer preceding the signing of the covenant (Neh 9 5); possibly identical with the Hashabiah (ḥăshabhyāh) of Ezr 8 19.24; Neh 10 11; 11 22; 12 24, or one of these.

HASHBADANA, hash-ba-dā'na, HASHBADDANA, hash-bad'a-na (חַשְׁבַּדָּנָה, ḥashbaddānāh): Probably a Levite. He was one of those who stood at Ezra's left hand when he read the law, and helped the people to understand the meaning (Neh 8 4). 1 Esd 9 44 has "Nabarias" (Ναβαρείας, Nabareías).

HASHEM, hā'shem (הָשֵׁם, hāshēm): The "sons of Hashem" are mentioned (1 Ch 11 34) among David's mighty men. The ‖ passage (2 S 23 32) has "sons of Jashen."

HASHMONAH, hash'mō-na (חַשְׁמֹנָה, ḥashmōnāh, "fatness"): A desert camp of the Israelites between Mithkah and Moseroth (Nu 33 29.30). See Wanderings of Israel.

HASHUB, hā'shub, hash'ub. See Hasshub.

HASHUBAH, ha-shōō'ba (חֲשֻׁבָה, ḥăshubhāh, "consideration"): One of the sons of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3 20).

HASHUM, hā'shum (חָשֻׁם, ḥāshụm):

(1) In Ezr 2 19; Neh 7 22, "children of Hashum" are mentioned among the returning exiles. In Ezr 10 33 (cf 1 Esd 9 33, "Asom"), members of the same family are named among those who married foreign wives.

(2) One of those who stood on Ezra's left at the reading of the law (Neh 8 4; 1 Esd 9 44, "Lothasubus"). The signer of the covenant (Neh 10 18) is possibly the same.

HASIDAEANS, has-i-dē'anz ('Ασιδαῖοι, Hasidaíoi, a transliteration of ḥăṣīdhīm, "the pious," "Puritans"): A name assumed by the orthodox Jews (1 Macc 2 42; 7 13) to distinguish them from the Hellenizing faction described in the Maccabean books as the "impious," the "lawless," the "transgressors." They held perhaps narrow but strict and seriously honest views in religion, and recognized Judas Maccabaeus as their leader (2 Macc 14 6). They existed as a party before the days of the Maccabees, standing on the ancient ways, caring little for politics, and having small sympathy with merely national aspirations, except when affecting religion (1 Macc 1 63; 2 Macc 6 18 ff; Jth 12 2; Ant, XIV, iv, 3). Their coöperation with Judas went only to the length of securing the right to follow their own religious practices. When Bacchides came against Jerus, they were quite willing to make peace because Alcimus, "a priest of the seed of Aaron," was in his company. Him they accepted as high priest, though sixty of them soon fell by his treachery (1 Macc 7 13). Their desertion of Judas was largely the cause of his downfall. J. Hutchison

HASMONEANS. See Asmoneans.

HASRAH, haz'ra, has'ra (חַסְרָה, ḥaṣrāh): Grandfather of Shallum, who was the husband of Huldah the prophetess (2 Ch 34 22). In 2 K 22 14, Harhas (q.v.).

HASSENAAH, has-ḗ-nā'a (הַסְּנָאָה, haṣṣᵉnā'āh): In Neh 3 3 the "sons of Hassenaah" are mentioned among the builders of the wall. Probably the same as Senaah (Ezr 2 35; Neh 7 38) with the definite article, i.e. has-Senaah. The latter, from the connection, would appear to be a place-name. See also Hassenuah.

HASSENUAH, has-e-nū'a (הַסְּנֻאָה, הַסְּנוּאָה, haṣṣᵉnū'āh): A family name in the two lists of Benjamite inhabitants of Jerus (1 Ch 9 7, AV "Hasenuah"; Neh 11 9, "Senuah"). The name is possibly the same as Hassenaah (q.v.), yet the occurrence of the singular ("son of H.") does not so well accord with the idea of a place-name.

HASSHUB, hash'ub (חַשּׁוּב, ḥashshūbh, "considerate"; AV everywhere Hashub except 1 Ch 9 14):

(1) A builder of the wall (Neh 3 11).

(2) Another builder of the same name (Neh 3 23).

(3) One of the signers of the covenant (Neh 10 23).

(4) A Levite chief (Neh 11 15; 1 Ch 9 14). BDB makes (1) and (3) identical.

HASSOPHERETH, has-o-fē'reth. See Sophereth.

HASTE, hāst (חָפַז, ḥāphaz, חוּשׁ, ḥūsh, מָהַר, māhar; σπεύδω, speúdō): "Haste" (from a root meaning "to pursue") implies "celerity of motion."

(1) The noun occurs as tr of māhar, "to hasten," etc (Ex 10 16; 12 33, "in haste"); of ḥāphaz, "to make haste" (2 K 7 15; Ps 31 22; 116 11, "I said in my haste [RVm "alarm"], All men are liars"); of ḥippāzōn, a "hasty flight" (Ex 12 11; Dt 16 3; Isa 52 12); of nāḥaç, "to be urgent" (1 S 21 8, "The king's business required haste").

(2) "Haste" as a vb. is trans and intrans; instances of the transitive use are, 'ūç, "to hasten," "press" (Ex 5 13, "And the taskmasters hasted them," RV "were urgent"); ḥūsh, "to make haste" (Isa 5 19); māhar (2 Ch 24 5 bis); shāḳadh, "to watch," "to fix one's attention" on anything (Jer 1 12 AV, "I will hasten my word"); māhīr, "hasting" (Isa 16 5, "hasting righteousness," RV "swift to do"). The intransitive use is more frequent and represents many different words.

Hasty also occurs in several instances (Prov 21 5; 29 20, 'ūç, etc); in Isa 28 4, bikkūr, "first-fruit," is tr^{d} "hasty fruit," RV "first-ripe fig."

RV has "Haste ye" for "assemble yourselves" (Joel 3 11 m, as AV); "make haste" for "speedily" (Ps 143 7); "and hasted to catch whether it were his mind" (for 1 K 20 33 AV); "and it hasteth toward the end," m "Heb panteth," for "but at the end it shall speak" (Hab 2 3); "hastily" for "suddenly" (1 Tim 5 22); for "and for this I make haste" (Job 20 2), "even by reason of my haste that is in me," m "and by reason of this my haste is within me"; for "hasten after another god" (Ps 16 4), ARV has "that give gifts for another god," ERV "exchange the Lord for"; for "hasten hereunto" (Eccl 2 25), "have enjoyment"; for "hasten hither" (1 K 22 9), "fetch quickly"; for "and gather" (Ex 9 19), "hasten in"; for "hasteneth that he may" (Isa 51 14), "shall speedily"; for "hasteth to" (Job 9 26), "swoopeth on"; for "and hasteth" (40 23), "he trembleth"; for "hasty" (Dnl 2 15), "urgent."

HASUPHA, ha-sū'fa (חֲשׂוּפָא, חֲשֻׂפָא, ḥăsūphā'): Head of a family of Nethinim among the returning exiles (Ezr 2 43; Neh 7 46). Neh 7 46 AV has "Hashupha," and 1 Esd 5 29, "Asipha."

HAT: The original word (כַּרְבְּלָא, karb^{e}lā', Aram.) rendered "hat" in Dnl 3 21 AV is very rare, appearing only here in the OT. There is acknowledged difficulty in translating it, as well as the other words of the passage. "Hat" of AV certainly fails to give its exact meaning. The hat as we know it, i.e. headgear distinguished from the cap or bonnet by a circular brim, was unknown to the ancient East. The nearest thing to the modern hat among the ancients was the petasus worn by the Romans when on a journey, though something like it was used on like occasions by the early Greeks. In the earlier Heb writings there is little concerning the headgear worn by the people. In 1 K 20 31 we find mention of "ropes" upon the head in connection with "sackcloth" on the loins. On Egyp monuments are found pictures of Syrians likewise with cords tied about their flowing hair. The custom, however, did not survive, or was modified, clearly because the cord alone would afford no protection against the sun, to which peasants and travelers were perilously exposed. It is likely, therefore, that for kindred reasons the later Israelites used a head-covering similar to that of the modern Bedouin. This consists of a rectangular piece of cloth called keffīyeh, which is usually folded into triangular form and placed over the head so as to let the middle part hang down over the back of the neck and protect it from the sun, while the two ends are drawn as needed under the chin and tied, or thrown back over the shoulders. A cord of wool is then used to secure it at the top. It became customary still later for Israelites to use a head-covering more like the "turban" worn by the fellaheen today. It consists in detail of a piece of cotton cloth worked into the form of a cap (takîyeh), and so worn as to protect the other headgear from being soiled by the perspiration. A felt cap, or, as among the Turks, a fez or red tarbush, is worn over this. On the top of these is wound a long piece of cotton cloth with red stripes and fringes, a flowered kerchief, or a striped keffîyeh. This protects the head from the sun, serves as a sort of purse by day, and often as a pillow by night. Some such headgear is probably meant by the "diadem" of Job 29 14 and the "hood" of Isa 3 23, Heb çānīph, from çānaph, "to roll up like a coil" (cf Isa 22 18).

HATACH, hā'tak. See Hathach.

HATCHET, hach'et (כַּשִּׁיל, kashshīl): Ps 74 6 RV, "hatchet," AV "axes." See Ax.

HATE, hāt, HATRED, hā'tred (vb., שָׂנֵא, sānē', "oftenest," שָׂטַם, sāṭam, Gen 27 41, etc; noun, שִׂנְאָה, sin'āh; μισέω, miséō): A feeling of strong antagonism and dislike, generally malevolent and prompting to injury (the opposite of love); sometimes born of moral resentment. Alike in the OT and NT, hate of the malevolent sort is unsparingly condemned (Nu 35 20; Ps 109 5; Prov 10 12; Tit 3 3; 1 Jn 3 15), but in the OT hatred of evil and evil-doers, purged of personal malice, is commended (Ps 97 10; 101 3; 139 21.22, etc). The NT law softens this feeling as regards persons, bringing it under the higher law of love (Mt 5 43.44; cf Rom 12 17–21), while intensifying the hatred of evil (Jude ver 23; Rev 2 6). God himself is hated by the wicked (Ex 20 5; Ps 139 21; cf Rom 8 7). Sometimes, however, the word "hate" is used hyperbolically in a relative sense to express only the strong preference of one to another. God loved Jacob, but hated Esau (Mal 1 3; Rom 9 13); father and mother are to be hated in comparison with Christ (Lk 14 26; cf Mt 10 37). See Enmity.

James Orr

HATHACH, hā'thak (הֲתָךְ, hăthākh; LXX Ἀχραθαῖος, Hachrathaíos): One of the chamberlains of Ahasuerus, appointed to attend on Esther (Est 4 5.6.9.10, AV "Hatach"), through whom she learned from Mordecai of Haman's plot.

HATHATH, hā'thath (חֲתַת, ḥăthath, "terror"): Son of Othniel and grandson of Kenaz (1 Ch 4 13).

HATIPHA, ha-tī'fa, hat'i-fa (חֲטִיפָא, ḥăṭīphā', "taken," "captive" [?]): The ancestral head of a family of Nethinim that returned from Babylon (Ezr 2 54; Neh 7 56 = "Atipha," 1 Esd 5 32).

HATITA, ha-tī'ta, hat'i-ta (חֲטִיטָא, ḥăṭīṭā'): Head of a family among the "children of the porters" who returned from exile (Ezr 2 42; Neh 7 45; 1 Esd 5 28, "Ateta").

HATSI-HAMMENUCHOTH, hat-si-ham-en-ū'koth: A marginal reading in 1 Ch 2 52 AV. It disappears in RV, which reads in text, "half of the Menuhoth" (q.v.) (Heb ḥăçī ha-m^{e}nuḥōth).

HATTIL, hat'il (חַטִּיל, ḥaṭṭīl): A company of servants of Solomon appearing in the post-exilic literature (Ezr 2 57; Neh 7 59). Same called "Agia" in 1 Esd 5 34.

HATTUSH, hat'ush (חַטּוּשׁ, ḥaṭṭūsh):

(1) Son of Shemaiah, a descendant of the kings of Judah, in the 5th generation from Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3 22). He returned with Zerubbabel and Ezra from Babylon to Jerus (Ezr 8 2; Neh 12 2). (There is some doubt as to whether the Hattush of the lineage of David and the priest of the same name, mentioned in Neh 10 4 and 12 2, are one and the same.) He was one of those who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh 10 4).

(2) Son of Hashabneiah; aided Nehemiah to repair the walls of Jerus (Neh 3 10).

Horace J. Wolf

HAUNT, hônt, hänt: The vb. in OE was simply "to resort to," "frequent"; a place of dwelling or of business was a haunt. The noun occurs in 1 S 23 22 as the tr of reghel, "foot," "See his place where his haunt is," RVm "Heb 'foot' "; the vb. is the tr of yāshabh, "to sit down," "to dwell" (Ezk 26 17, "on all that haunt it," RV "dwelt there," m "inhabited her"), and of hālakh, "to go," or "live" (1 S 30 31, "all the places where David himself and his men were wont to haunt").

HAURAN, hô′ran (חַוְרָן, ḥawrān; LXX Αὐρανῖτις, Auranítis, also with aspirate): A province of Eastern Pal which, in Ezk 47 16.18,

1. Extent of Province in Ancient Times stretched from Dan in the N. to Gilead in the S., including all that lay between the Jordan and the desert. It thus covered the districts now known as el-Jēdūr, el-Jaulān, and el-Ḥaurān. It corresponded roughly with the jurisdiction of the modern Turkish governor of Hauran. The Auranites of later times answered more closely to the Hauran of today.

2. Modern Hauran

The name Ḥaurān probably means "hollow land." Between Jebel ed-Druze (see Bashan, Mount of) on the E., and Jēdūa and Jaulān (see Golan) on the W., runs a broad vale, from Jebel el ʿAswad in the N., to the Yarmuk in the S.W., and the open desert in the S.E. It is from 1,500 to 2,000 ft. above sea-level, and almost 50 miles in length, by 45 in breadth. Ḥaurān aptly describes it. 3. En-Nuḳrah To the modern Ḥaurān are reckoned 3 districts, clearly distinguished in local speech: (1) En-Nuḳrah, "the cavity." This district touches the desert in the S.E., the low range of ez Zumleh on the S.W., Jaulān on the W., el-Lejā' on the N. and, Jebel ed-Druze on the E. The soil, composed of volcanic detritus, is extraordinarily rich. Here and there may be found a bank of vines; but the country is practically treeless: the characteristic product is wheat, and in its cultivation the village population is almost wholly occupied. 4. El-Lejā' (2) El-Lejā', "the asylum." This is a rocky tract lying to the N. of en-Nuḳrah. It is entirely volcanic, and takes, roughly, the form of a triangle, with apex in the N. at el Burak, and a base of almost 20 miles in the S. For the general characteristics of this district, see Trachonitis. Its sharply marked border, where the rocky edges fall into the surrounding plain, have suggested to some the thought that here we have ḥebhel 'argōbh, "the measured lot of Argob." See, however, Argob. There is little land capable of cultivation, and the Arabs who occupy the greater part have an evil reputation. As a refuge for the hunted and for fugitives from justice it well deserves its name. 5. El-Jebel (3) El-Jebel, "the mountain." This is the great volcanic range which stands on the edge of the desert, protecting the fertile reaches of el-Ḥaurān from encroachment by the sand, known at different times as Mons Asaldamus, Jebel Ḥaurān, and Jebel ed-Druze. This last is the name it bears today in consequence of the settlement of Druzes here, after the massacre in Mt. Lebanon in 1860. Those free-spirited people have been a thorn in the side of the Turks ever since: and whether or not the recent operations against them (January, 1911) will result in their entire subjugation, remains to be seen. The western slopes of the mountain are well cultivated, and very fruitful; vineyards abound; and there are large reaches of shady woodlands. Ṣalkhad, marking the eastern boundary of the land of Israel, stands on the ridge of the mountain to the S. Jebel el-Kuleib in which the range culminates, reaches a height of 5,730 ft. Jebel Ḥaurān is named in the Mish (Rōsh ha-shānāh, ii.4) as one of the heights from which fire-signals were flashed, announcing the advent of the new year. For its history see Bashan. The ruins which are so plentiful in the country date for the most part from the early Christian centuries; and probably nothing above ground is older than the Rom period. The substructions, however, and the subterranean dwellings found in different parts, e.g. at Ḍerʿah, may be very ancient. The latest mention of a Christian building is in an inscription found by the present writer at el-Kufr, which tells of the foundation of a church in 720 AD (PEFS, July, 1895, p. 275, Inscr no. 150). A good account of Hauran and its cities is given in HGHL, XXIX, 611.

HAVE, hav: "To have" is to own or possess; its various uses may be resolved into this, its proper meaning.

A few of the many changes in RV are, for "a man that hath friends" (Prov 18 24), "maketh many friends," m "Heb a man of friends"; for "all that I have" (Lk 15 31), "all that is mine"; for "we have peace with God" (Rom 5 1) ERV has "let us have," m "some ancient authorities read we have," ARV as AVm "many ancient authorities read let us have"; for "what great conflict I have" (Col 2 1), "how greatly I strive"; for "will have" (Mt 9 13; 12 7), "desire"; 27 43, "desireth"; for "would have" (Mk 6 19; Acts 10 10), "desired"; 16 27, "was about"; 19 30, "was minded to"; 23 28, "desiring"; He 12 17, "desired to"; for "ye have" (He 10 34), ERV has "ye yourselves have," m "ye have your own-selves," ARV "ye have for yourselves," m "many ancient authorities read, ye have your own selves for a better possession" (cf Lk 9 25; 21 19); "having heard" for "after that ye heard" (Eph 1 13); "having suffered before," for "even after that we had suffered" (1 Thess 2 2); "and thus, having," for "so after he had" (He 6 15).

HAVEN, hā′v'n ([1] חוֹף, ḥōph [Gen 49 13, RVm "beach"; Jgs 5 17, RVm "shore," AV "seashore," AVm "port"]; elsewhere "sea-shore" [Dt 1 7; Josh 9 1; Jer 47 7] or "sea coast" [Ezk 25 16]; from root חָפַף, ḥāphaph, "to wash" or "to lave"; cf Arab. حَفَّ, ḥaffa, "to rub"; and حَفَّة, ḥaffat, "border"; حُفُوف, Ḥufûf, in Eastern Arabia; [2] מָחוֹז, māḥōz [Ps 107 30]; [3] λιμήν, limēn [Acts 27 12 bis]; also Fair Havens, καλοὶ λιμένες, kaloí liménes [Acts 27 8]): While the Gr limēn is "harbor," the Heb ḥōph is primarily "shore." There is no harbor worthy of the name on the shore of Pal S. of Ḥaifa. Indeed there is no good natural harbor on the whole coast of Syria and Pal. The promontories of Carmel, Beirût and Tripolis afford shelter from the prevalent southwest wind, but offer no refuge from the fury of a northern gale. On rocky shores there are inlets which will protect sail boats at most times, but the ships of the ancients were beached in rough weather, and small craft are so treated at the present time. See illustration under Bithynia, p. 483.

HAVENS, hā′v'nz, FAIR. See Fair Havens.

HAVILAH, hav′i-lä (חֲוִילָה, ḥăwīlāh; Εὐιλά, Heuilá):

(1) Son of Cush (Gen 10 7; 1 Ch 1 9).

(2) Son of Yoktan, descendant of Shem (Gen 10 29; 1 Ch 1 23).

(3) Mentioned with Shur as one of the limits of the territory of the Ishmaelites (Gen 25 18); cf the same limits of the land of the Amalekites (1 S 15 7), where, however, the text is doubtful. It is described (Gen 2 11.12) as bounded by the river Pishon and as being rich in gold, bdellium and "shoham-stone" (EV "onyx"). The shoham-stone was perhaps the Assyr samtu, probably the malachite or turquoise. The mention of a Cushite Havilah is explained by the fact that the Arabian tribes at an early time migrated to the coast of Africa. The context of Gen 10 7 thus favors a situation on the Ethiopian shore, and the name is perhaps preserved in the kolpos Aualites and in the tribe Abalitai on the S. side of the straits of Bab-el-Mandeb. Or possibly a trace of the name appears in the classical Aualis, now Zeila' in Somaliland. But its occurrence among the Yoktanite Arabs (Gen 10 29) suggests a location in Arabia. South Arabian inscriptions mention a district of Khaulan (Ḥaulan), and a place of this name is found both in Tihama and S.E. of San'ā'. Again Strabo's Chaulotaioi and Ḥuwaila in Bahrein point to a district on the Arabian shore of the Pers Gulf. No exact identification has yet been made.

HAVOC, hav′ok: "Devastation," "to make havoc of" is the tr of λυμαίνομαι, lumaínomai, "to stain," "to disgrace"; in the NT "to injure," "destroy" (Acts 8 3, "As for Saul he made havoc of the church," RV "laid waste"; 1 Macc 7 7, "what havoc," RV "all the havock," exolóthreusis, "utter destruction").

RV has "made havoc of" (porthéō) for "destroyed" (Acts 9 21; Gal 1 23), for "wasted" (Gal 1 13).

HAVVAH, hav′a (חַוָּה, ḥawwāh): Heb spelling, rendered Eve, "mother of all living," Gen 3 20 RVm. See Eve.

HAVVOTH-JAIR, hav-oth-jā′ir (חַוֹּת יָאִיר, ḥawwōth yā'īr, "the encampments" or "tent villages of Jair"; AV Havoth-Jair, hā-voth-jā′ir): The word ḥawwōth occurs only in this combination (Nu 32 41; Dt 3 14; Jgs 10 4), and is a legacy from the nomadic stage of Heb life. Jair had thirty sons who possessed thirty "cities," and these are identified with Havvoth-jair in Jgs 10 3 ff. The district was in Gilead (ver 5; Nu 32 41). In Dt 3 13 f, it is identified with Bashan and Argob; but in 1 K 4 13, "the towns of Jair" are said to be in Gilead; while to him also "pertained the region of Argob, which is in Bashan, threescore great cities with walls and brazen bars." There is evident confusion here. If we follow Jgs 10 3 ff, we may find a useful clue in ver 5. Kamon is named as the burial place of Jair. This probably corresponds to Kamun taken by Antiochus III, on his march from Pella to Gephrun (Polyb. v.70, 12). Schumacher (Northern 'Ajlūn, 137) found two places to the W. of Irbid with the names Ḳamm and Ḳumeim (the latter a diminutive of the former) with ancient ruins. Ḳamm probably represents the Heb Ḳāmōn, so that Havvoth-jair should most likely be sought in this district, i.e. in North Gilead, between the Jordan valley and Jebel ez-Zumleh.

HAWK, hôk (נֵץ, nēç; ἱέραξ, hiérax, and γλαῦξ, glaúx; Lat Accipiter nisus): A bird of prey of the genus accipiter. Large hawks were numerous in Pal. The largest were 2 ft. long, have flat heads, hooked beaks, strong talons and eyes appearing the keenest and most comprehensive of any bird. They can sail the length or breadth of the Holy Land many times a day. It is a fact worth knowing that mist and clouds interfere with the vision of birds and they hide, and hungry and silent wait for fair weather, so you will see them sailing and soaring on clear days only. These large hawks and the glede are of eagle-like nature, nesting on Carmel and on the hills of Galilee, in large trees and on mountain crags. They flock near Beersheba, and live in untold numbers in the wilderness of the Dead Sea. They build a crude nest of sticks and twigs and carry most of the food alive to their young. Of course they were among the birds of prey that swarm over the fresh offal from slaughter and sacrifice. No bird steers with its tail in flight in a more pronounced manner than the hawk. These large birds are all-the-year residents, for which reason no doubt the people distinguished them from smaller families that migrated. They knew the kite that Isaiah mentioned in predicting the fall of Edom. With them the smaller, brighter-colored kestrels, that flocked over the rocky shores of the Dead Sea and over the ruins of deserted cities, seemed to be closest in appearance to the birds we include in the general term "falcon." They ate mice, insects and small birds, but not carrion. The abomination lists of Lev 11 16 and Dt 14 15 each include hawks in a general term and specify several species as unfit for food. Job 39 26 reads:

Kestrel (Tinnunculus alaudarius).

> "Is it by thy wisdom that the hawk soareth,
> And stretcheth her wings toward the south?"

Aside from calling attention to the miraculous flight, this might refer to migration, or to the wonderful soaring exhibitions of these birds. See Glede; Kite; Night Hawk; Falcon.

HAZAEL, ha-zā′el, hā′za-el, haz′a-el (חֲזָאֵל and חֲזָהאֵל, ḥăzā'ēl and ḥăzāh'ēl; 'Αζαήλ, Hazaél; Assyr haza'ilu): Comes first into Bib. history as a high officer in the service of Ben-hadad II, king of Syria (2 K 8 7 ff; cf 1 K 19 15 ff). He had been sent by his sick sovereign to inquire of the prophet

1. In Biblical History

Elisha, who was then in Damascus, whether he should recover of his sickness or not. He took with him a present "even of every good thing of Damascus, forty camels' burden," and stood before the man of God with his master's question of life or death. To it Elisha made the oracular response, "Go, say unto him, Thou shalt surely recover; howbeit Jeh hath showed me that he shall surely die." Elisha looked stedfastly at Hazael and wept, explaining to the incredulous officer that he was to be the perpetrator of horrible cruelties against the children of Israel: "Their strongholds wilt thou set on fire, and their young men wilt thou slay with the sword, and wilt dash in pieces their little ones, and rip up their women with child" (2 K 8 12). Hazael protested against the very thought of such things, but Elisha assured him that Jeh had shown him that he was to be king of Syria. No sooner had Hazael delivered to his master the answer of the man of God than the treacherous purpose took shape in his heart to hasten Ben-hadad's end, and "He took the coverlet, and dipped it in water, and spread it on his face, so that he died: and Hazael reigned in his stead" (2 K 8 15). The reign which opened under such sinister auspices proved long and successful, and brought the kingdom of Syria to the zenith of its power. Hazael soon found occasion to invade Israel. It was at Ramoth-gilead, which had already been the scene of a fierce conflict between Israel and Syria when Ahab met his death, that Hazael encountered Joram, the king of Israel, with whom his kinsman, Ahaziah, king of Judah, had joined forces to retain that important fortress which had been recovered from the Syrians (2 K 9 14.15). The final issue of the battle is not recorded, but Joram received wounds which obliged him to return across the Jordan to Jezreel, leaving the forces of Israel in command of Jehu, whose anointing by Elisha's deputy at Ramoth-gilead, usurpation of the throne of Israel, slaughter of Joram, Ahaziah and Jezebel, and vengeance upon the whole house of Ahab are told in rapid and tragic succession by the sacred historian (2 K 9, 10).

Whatever was the issue of this attack upon Ramoth-gilead, it was not long before Hazael laid waste the whole country E. of the Jordan—"all the land of Gilead, the Gadites, and the Reubenites, and the Manassites, from Aroer, which is by the valley of the Arnon, even Gilead and Bashan" (2 K 10 33; cf Am 1 3). Nor did Judah escape the heavy hand of the Syrian oppressor. Marching southward through the plain of Esdraelon, and following a route along the maritime plain taken by many conquerors before and since, Hazael fought against Gath and took it, and then "set his face to go up to Jerus" (2 K 12 17). As other kings of Judah had to do with other conquerors, Jehoash, who was now on the throne, bought off the invader with the gold and the treasures of temple and palace, and Hazael withdrew his forces from Jerus.

Israel, however, still suffered at the hands of Hazael and Ben-hadad, his son, and the sacred historian mentions that Hazael oppressed Israel all the days of Jehoahaz, the son of Jehu. So grievous was the oppression of the Syrians that Hazael "left not to Jehoahaz of the people save fifty horsemen, and ten chariots, and ten thousand footmen; for the king of Syria destroyed them, and made them like the dust in threshing" (2 K 13 1–7). Forty or fifty years later Amos, in the opening of his prophecy, recalled those Syrian campaigns against Israel when he predicted vengeance that was to come upon Damascus. "Thus saith Jeh . . . . I will send a fire into the house of Hazael, and it shall devour the palaces of Ben-hadad" (Am 1 3.4).

2. In the Monuments

Already however, the power of Syria had passed its meridian and had begun to decline. Events of which there is no express record in the Bib. narrative were proceeding which, ere long, made it possible for the son of Jehoahaz, Joash or Jehoash, to retrieve the honor of Israel and recover the cities that had been lost (2 K 13 25). For the full record of these events we must turn to the Assyr annals preserved in the monuments. We do read in the sacred history that Jeh gave Israel "a saviour, so that they went out from under the hand of the Syrians" (2 K 13 5). The annals of the Assyr kings give us clearly and distinctly the interpretation of this enigmatic saying. The relief that came to Israel was due to the crippling of the power of Syria by the aggression of Assyria upon the lands of the West. From the Black Obelisk in the British Museum, on which Shalmaneser II (860–825 BC) has inscribed the story of the campaign he carried on during his long reign, there are instructive notices of this period of Israelitish history. In the 18th year of his reign (842 BC), Shalmaneser made war against Hazael. On the Obelisk the record is short, but a longer account is given on one of the pavement slabs from Nimroud, the ancient Kalab. It is as follows: "In the 18th year of my reign for the 16th time I crossed the Euphrates. Hazael of Damascus trusted to the strength of his armies and mustered his troops in full force. Senir [Hermon], a mountain summit which is in front of Lebanon, he made his stronghold. I fought with him; his defeat I accomplished; 600 of his soldiers with weapons I laid low; 1,121 of his chariots, 470 of his horses, with his camp I took from him. To save his life, he retreated; I pursued him; in Damascus, his royal city, I shut him up. His plantations I cut down. As far as the mountains of the Hauran I marched. Cities without number I wrecked, razed, and burnt with fire. Their spoil beyond count I carried away. As far as the mountains of Baal-Rosh, which is a headland of the sea [at the mouth of the Nahr el-Kelb, Dog River], I marched; my royal likeness I there set up. At that time I received the tribute of the Syrians and Sidonians and of Yahua [Jehu] the son of Khumri [Omri]" (Ball, Light from the East, 166; Schrader, COT, 200 f). From this inscription we gather that Shalmaneser did not succeed in the capture of Damascus. But it still remained an object of ambition to Assyria, and Ramman-nirari III, the grandson of Shalmaneser, succeeded in capturing it, and reduced it to subjection. It was this monarch who was "the saviour" whom God raised up to deliver Israel from the hand of Syria. Then it became possible for Israel under Jehoash to recover the cities he had lost, but by this time Hazael had died and Ben-hadad, his son, Ben-hadad III, called Mari on the monuments, had become king in his stead (2 K 13 24.25).

HAZAIAH, ha-zā′ya (חֲזָיָה, ḥăzāyāh, "Jah sees"): Among the inhabitants of Jerus mentioned in the list of Judahites in Neh 11 5.

HAZAR, hā′zär (חֲצַר, ḥăçar, constr. of חָצֵר, ḥāçēr, "an inclosure," "settlement," or "village"): Is frequently the first element in Heb place-names.

1. Hazar-addar

Hazar-addar (Heb ḥăçar 'addār), a place on the southern boundary of Judah (Nu 34 4), is probably identical with Hazron (Josh 15 3), which, in this case, however, is separated from Addar (AV "Adar"). It seems to have lain somewhere to the S.W. of Kadesh-barnea.

2. Hazar-enan

Hazar-enan (Heb ḥăçar ‘ēnān, "village of springs": ‘ēnān is Aram.; once [Ezk 47 17] it is called Enon), a place, unidentified, at the junction of the northern and eastern frontiers of the land promised to Israel (Nu 34 9 f; cf Ezk 47 17; 48 1). To identify it with the sources of the Orontes seems to leave too great a gap between this and the places named to the S. Buhl (GAP, 66 f) would draw the northern boundary from Nahr el-Ḳāsimīyeh to the foot of Hermon, and would locate Hazar-enan at Bāniās. The springs there lend fitness to the name; a condition absent from el-Ḥāḍr, farther east, suggested by von Kesteren. But there is no certainty.

3. Hazar-gaddah Hazar-gaddah (Heb ḥăçar-gaddāh), a place in the territory of Judah "toward the border of Edom in the South" (Josh 15 21.27). Onom (s.v. "Gadda") places it in the uttermost parts of the Daroma, overlooking the Dead Sea. This might point to the site of Masada, or to the remarkable ruins of Umm Bajjaḳ farther south (GAP, 185).

4. Hazar-hatticon Hazar-hatticon (RV HAZER-HATTICON; Heb ḥăçēr ha-tīkhōn, "the middle village"), a place named on the ideal border of Israel (Ezk 47 16). The context shows that it is identical with Hazar-enan, for which this is apparently another name. Possibly, however, it is due to a scribal error.

5. Hazar-maveth Hazarmaveth (Heb ḥăçarmāweth), the name of a son of Joktan attached to a clan or district in South Arabia (Gen 10 26; 1 Ch 1 20). It is represented by the modern Ḥaḍramaut, a broad and fruitful valley running nearly parallel with the coast for about 100 miles, north of el-Yemen. The ruins and inscriptions found by Glaser show that it was once the home of a great civilization, the capital being Sabata (Gen 10 7) (Glaser, Skizze, II, 20, 423 ff).

6. Hazar-shual Hazar-shual (Heb ḥăçar shū'āl), a place in the S. of Judah (Josh 15 28) assigned to Simeon (Josh 19 3; 1 Ch 4 28). It was reoccupied after the exile (Neh 11 27). Sa'weh on a hill E. of Beersheba has been suggested; but there is no certainty.

7. Hazar-susah Hazar-susah (Heb ḥăçar ṣūṣāh, Josh 19 5), Hazar-susim (Heb ḥăçar ṣūṣīm, 1 Ch 4 31). As it stands, the name means "station of a mare" or "of horses," and it occurs along with Beth-marcaboth, "place of chariots," which might suggest depots for trade in chariots and horses. The sites have not been identified. W. Ewing

HAZAR-ADDAR, ad'ăr; -ENAN, ē'nan; -GADDAH, gad'a; -HATTICON, hat'i-kon; -MAVETH, mā'veth; -SHUAL, shōō'al; -SUSA, sū'sa; -SUSIM, sū'sim. See Hazar.

HAZAZON-TAMAR, haz'a-zan-tā'mar (חַצֲצֹן תָּמָר, ḥaçăçōn tāmār; AV Hazezon Tamar): "Hazazon of the palm trees," mentioned (Gen 14 7) as a place of the Amorites, conquered, together with En-mishpat and the country of the Amalekites, by Chedorlaomer; in 2 Ch 20 2 it is identified with En-Gedi (q.v.); and if so, it must have been its older name. If this identification be accepted, then Hazazon may survive in the name Wādy Husāsah, N.W. of 'Ain Jidy. Another suggestion, which certainly meets the needs of the narrative better, is that Hazazon-tamar is the Thamara of OS (85 3; 210 86), the Θαμαρω, Thamarō, of Ptol. xvi.3. The ruin Kurnub, 20 miles W.S.W. of the S. end of the Dead Sea—on the road from Hebron to Elath—is supposed to mark this site.

HAZEL, hā'z'l (Gen 30 37 AV). See Almond.

HAZER-HATTICON, hā'zēr-hat'i-kon, HAZAR-HATTICON. See Hazar.

HAZERIM, ha-zē'rim, haz'ēr-im (חֲצֵרִים, ḥăçērīm): Is rendered in AV (Dt 2 23) as the name of a place in the S.W. of Pal, in which dwelt the Avvim, ancient inhabitants of the land. The word means "villages," and ought to be tr^{d} as in RV. The sentence means that the Avvim dwelt in villages—not in fortified towns—before the coming of the Caphtorim, the Philis, who destroyed them.

HAZEROTH, ha-zē'rōth, haz'ēr-oth (חֲצֵרוֹת, ḥăçērōth, "inclosures"): A camp of the Israelites, the 3d from Sinai (Nu 11 35; 12 16; 33 17; Dt 1 1). It is identified with 'Ain Ḥaḍrah ("spring of the inclosure"), 30 miles N.E. of Jebel Musa, on the way to the 'Arābāh. See Wanderings of Israel.

HAZEZON-TAMAR, haz'ĕ-zon-tā'mar (חַצֲצֹן תָּמָר, ḥaçăçōn tāmār, Gen 14 7 AV; חַצְצֹן תָּמָר, ḥaççōn tāmār, 2 Ch 20 2). See Hazazon-Tamar.

HAZIEL, hā'zi-el (חֲזִיאֵל, ḥăzī'ēl, "God sees"): A Levite of the sons of Shimei, of David's time (1 Ch 23 9).

HAZO, hā'zō (חֲזוֹ, ḥăzō, fifth son of Nahor [Gen 22 22]): Possibly the eponym of a Nahorite family or clan.

HAZOR, hā'zor (חָצוֹר, ḥāçōr; Νασώρ, Nasōr, א, 'Ασώρ, Asōr, 1 Macc 11 67):

(1) The royal city of Jabin (Josh 11 1), which, before the Israelite conquest, seems to have been the seat of a wide authority (ver 11). It was taken by Joshua, who exterminated the inhabitants, and it was the only city in that region which he destroyed by fire (vs 11–13). At a later time the Jabin Dynasty appears to have recovered power and restored the city (Jgs 4 2). The heavy defeat of their army at the hands of Deborah and Barak led to their final downfall (vs 23 ff). It was in the territory allotted to Naphtali (Josh 19 36). Hazor was one of the cities for the fortification of which Solomon raised a levy (1 K 9 15). Along with other cities in Galilee, it was taken by Tiglath-pileser III (2 K 15 29). In the plain of Hazor, Jonathan the Maccabee gained a great victory over Demetrius (1 Macc 11 67 ff). In Tob 1 2 it is called "Asher" (LXX Ασήρ, Asēr), and Kedesh is said to be "above" it. Jos (Ant, V, v, 1) says that Hazor was situated over the lake, Semechonitis, which he evidently identifies with the Waters of Merom (Jos 11 13). For Hazor before time was the head of all these kingdoms (Jos 11). The Tell el-Amarna tablets, including the new one brought out by Thureau-Dangin discovered five years ago, confirm this statement. The long-lost city was discovered by Garstang, 1926, since confirmed by Vincent and Albright. It is at Tell el-Qedah 4 miles west of the southern end of Lake Ḥuleh. It measured 900 by 450 m., much larger than the great fortress of Megiddo (Annals of Anthropology and Archaeology, XIV, 35 ff). The statements of Josh are thus fully confirmed (Bull. American Schools of Oriental Research, Feb. 1928). This whole upper Jordan valley has yielded to the researches of Vincent, Albright, and Garstang a wonderful revelation concerning the early civilization of Palestine which extended to the Cities of the Plain.

(2) A town, unidentified, in the S. of Judah (Josh 15 23).

(3) A town in the S. of Judah (Josh 15 25). See Kerioth-hezron.

(4) A town in Benjamin (Neh 11 33) now represented by Khirbet Ḥazzūr, not far to the E. of Neby Samwīl.

(5) An unidentified place in Arabia, smitten by Nebuchadnezzar (Jer 49 28.33). W. Ewing

HAZOR-HADATTAH, hā'zor-ha-dat'a (Aram. חָצוֹר חֲדַתָּה, ḥāçōr ḥădhattāh, "New Hazor"): "An Aram. adj., however, in this region is so strange that the reading must be questioned" (Di). One of the "uttermost cities . . . . of Judah toward the border of Edom" (Josh 15 25). Eusebius and Jerome describe a "New Hazor" to the E. of Ascalon, but this is too far N.

HAZZELELPONI, haz-e-lel-pō′nī (הַצְּלֶלְפּוֹנִי, haççelelpōnī): A feminine name occurring in the list of the genealogy of Judah (1 Ch 4 3); probably representing a clan.

HE, hā (ה): The fifth letter of the Heb alphabet; transliterated in this Encyclopaedia as h. It came also to be used for the number 5. For name, etc, see ALPHABET.

HEAD, hed (רֹאשׁ, rō'sh, Aram. רֵאשׁ, rē'sh, and in special sense גֻּלְגֹּלֶת, gulgōleth, lit. "skull," "cut-off head" [1 Ch 10 10], whence Golgotha [Mt 27 33; Mk 15 22; Jn 19 17]; מְרַאֲשָׁה, *m*ᵉ*ra'ăshāh*, lit. "head-rest," "pillow," "bolster" [1 K 19 6]; קָדְקֹד, ḳodhḳōdh, lit. crown of the head [Dt 28 35; 33 16.20; 2 S 14 25; Isa 3 17; Jer 48 45]; בַּרְזֶל, barzel, "the head of an axe" [Dt 19 5, RVm "iron"; 2 K 6 5]; לֶהָבָה, lehābhāh, לַהֶבֶת, lahebheth, "the head of a spear" [1 S 17 7]; κεφαλή, kephalē): The first-mentioned Heb word and its Aram. form are found frequently in their literal as well as metaphorical sense. We may distinguish the following meanings:

1. Used of Men

By a slight extension of meaning, "head" occasionally stands for the person itself. This is the case in all passages where evil is said to return or to be requited upon the head of a person (see below).

2. Used of Animals

The word is also used in connection with the serpent's head (Gen 3 15), the head of the sacrificial ram, bullock and goat (Ex 29 10.15.19; Lev 4 4.24), the head of leviathan (Job 41 7 [Heb 40 31]).

3. The Head-Piece

It is used also as representing the top or summit of a thing, as the capital of a column or pillar (Ex 36 38; 38 28; 2 Ch 3 15); of mountains (Ex 19 20; Nu 21 20; Jgs 9 7; Am 1 2; 9 3); of a scepter (Est 5 2); of a ladder (Gen 28 12); of a tower (Gen 11 4).

4. Beginning, Source, Origin

As a fourth meaning the word occurs (Prov 8 23; Eccl 3 11; Isa 41 4) in the sense of beginning of months (Ex 12 2), of rivers (Gen 2 10), of streets or roads (Isa 51 20; Ezk 16 25; 21 21).

5. Leader, Prince

As a leader, prince, chief, chieftain, captain (or as an adj., with the meaning of foremost, uppermost), originally: "he that stands at the head"; cf "God is with us at our head" (2 Ch 13 12); "Knowest thou that Jeh will take away thy master from thy head?" (2 K 2 3); "head-stone," RV "top stone," i.e. the uppermost stone (Zec 4 7). Israel is called the head of nations (Dt 28 13); "The head [capital] of Syria is Damascus, and the head [prince] of Damascus is Rezin" (Isa 7 8); "heads of their fathers' houses," i.e. elders of the clans (Ex 6 14); cf "heads of tribes" (Dt 1 15), also "captain," lit. head (Nu 14 4; Dt 1 15; 1 Ch 11 42; Neh 9 17). The phrase "head and tail" (Isa 9 14; 19 15) is explained by the rabbis as meaning the nobles and the commons among the people; cf "palm-branch and rush" (9 14), "hair of the feet . . . . and beard" (7 20), but cf also Isa 9 15. In the NT we find the remarkable statement of Christ being "the head of the church" (Eph 1 22; 5 23), "head of every man" (1 Cor 11 3), "head of all principality and power" (Col 2 10), "head of the body, the church" (Col 1 18; cf Eph 4 15). The context of 1 Cor 11 3 is very instructive to a true understanding of this expression: "I would have you know, that the head of every man is Christ; and the head of the woman is the man; and the head of Christ is God" (cf Eph 5 23). Here, clearly, reference is had to the lordship of Christ over His church, not to the oneness of Christ and His church, while in Eph 4 16 the dependence of the church upon Christ is spoken of. These passages should not therefore be pressed to include the idea of Christ being the intellectual center, the brain of His people, from whence the members are passively governed, for to the Jewish mind the heart was the seat of the intellect, not the head. See HEART.

6. Various Uses

As the head is the most essential part of physical man, calamity and blessing are said to come upon the head of a person (Gen 49 26; Dt 33 16; Jgs 9 57; 1 S 25 39; 2 Ch 6 23; Ezk 9 10; 11 21; 16 43; 22 31). For this reason hands are placed upon the head of a person on which blessings are being invoked (Gen 48 14.17.18; Mt 19 15) and upon the sacrificial animal upon which sins are laid (Ex 29 15; Lev 1 4; 4 29.33). Responsibility for a deed is also said to rest on the head of the doer (2 S 1 16; 3 29; 1 K 8 32; Ps 7 16; Acts 18 6). The Bible teaches us to return good for evil (Mt 5 44), or in the very idiomatic Heb style, to "heap coals of fire upon [the] head" of the adversary (Prov 25 22; Rom 12 20). This phrase is dark as to its origin, but quite clear as to its meaning and application (cf Rom 12 17.19.21). The Jew was inclined to swear by his head (Mt 5 36), as the modern Oriental swears by his beard. The head is said to be under a vow (Nu 6 18.19; Acts 18 18; 21 23), because the Nazirite vow could readily be recognized by the head.

There are numerous idiomatic expressions connected with the head, of which we enumerate the following: "the hoary head" designates old age (see HAIR); "to round the corners of the head," etc (Lev 19 27; cf also Dt 14 1; Am 8 10), probably refers to the shaving of the side locks or the whole scalp among heathen nations, which was often done in idolatrous shrines or in token of initiation into the service of an idol. It was therefore forbidden to Israel, and its rigid observance gave rise to the peculiar Jewish custom of wearing long side locks (see HAIR). "Anointing the head" (Ps 23 5; 92 10; He 1 9) was a sign of joy and hospitality, while the "covering of the head" (2 S 15 30; Est 6 12; Jer 14 3), "putting the hand upon the head" (2 S 13 19) and putting earth, dust or ashes upon it (Josh 7 6; 1 S 4 12; 2 S 1 2; 13 19; Lam 2 10; cf Am 2 7) were expressive of sadness, grief, deep shame and mourning. In Est 7 8 Haman's face is covered as a condemned criminal, or as one who has been utterly put to shame, and who has nothing more to say for his life.

In this connection the Pauline injunction as to the veiling of women in the public gatherings of the Christians (1 Cor 11 5), while men were instructed to appear bareheaded, must be mentioned. This is diametrically opposed to the Jewish custom, according to which men wore the head covered by the ṭallīth or prayer shawl, while women were considered sufficiently covered by their long hair (1 Cor 11 15). The apostle here simply commends a Gr custom for the congregation residing among Gr populations; in other words, he recommends obedience to local standards of decency and good order.

"To bruise the head" (Gen 3 15) means to injure gravely; "to smite through the head" (Ps 68 21) is synonymous with complete destruction. "To shake or wag the head" (Ps 22 7; 44 14; 64 8; Jer 18 16; 48 27; Lam 2 15; Mt 27 39; Mk 15 29) conveys the meaning of open derision and contempt. "To bow down the head" (Isa 58 5) indicates humility, sadness and mourning, but it may also be a mere pretense for piety (Sir 19 26).

HEADBAND, hed′band. See Dress.

HEADDRESS, hed′dres. See Dress.

HEADSTONE, hed′stōn. See Corner-stone.

HEADSTRONG, hed′strong. See Heady.

HEADTIRE, hed′tīr. See Bonnet; Dress.

HEADY, hed′i: The tr in AV of προπετής, propetḗs, "falling forward," trop. "prone," "ready to do anything," "precipitate," "headlong" (2 Tim 3 4, "heady, high-minded," etc, RV "headstrong"; in Acts 19 36, the only other place in the NT where propetēs occurs, AV has "rashly," RV "rash"). "Headstrong signifies strong in the head or the mind, and heady, full of one's own head" (Crabb, Eng. Synonymes). "Heady confidence promises victory without contest" (Johnson).

HEAL, hēl (רָפָא, rāphā′; θεραπεύω, therapeúō, ἰάομαι, iáomai, διασώζω, diasōzō): The Eng. word is connected with the AS hælan, and is used in several senses: (1) Lit., in its meaning of making whole or well, as in Eccl 3 3. In this way it occurs in prayers for restoration to health (Nu 12 13; Ps 6 2; Jer 17 14); and also in declarations as to God's power to restore to health (Dt 32 39; 2 K 20 5–8). (2) Metaphorically it is applied to the restoration of the soul to spiritual health and to the repair of the injuries caused by sin (Ps 41 4; Jer 30 17). (3) The restoration and deliverance of the afflicted land is expressed by it in 2 Ch 7 14; Isa 19 22. (4) It is applied to the forgiveness of sin (Jer 3 22).

In the NT, therapeuō is used 10 t in describing Our Lord's miracles, and is tr^{d} "heal." Iaomai is used to express spiritual healing (Mt 13 15; Lk 5 17; Jn 12 40), and also of curing bodily disease (Jn 4 47). Diasōzō, meaning "to heal thoroughly," is used in Lk 7 3 AV where RV renders it "save." The act of healing is called iasis twice, in Acts 4 22.30; sōzō, to save or deliver, is tr^{d} "made whole" by RV in Mk 5 23; Lk 8 36; Acts 14 9, but is "healed" in AV. Conversely "made whole" AV in Mt 15 28 is replaced by "healed" in RV.

Healed is used 33 t in the OT as the rendering of the same Heb word, and in the same variety of senses. It is also used of purification for an offence or breach of the ceremonial law (2 Ch 30 20); and to express the purification of water which had caused disease (2 K 2 21.22). Figuratively the expression "healed slightly" (ERV "lightly") is used to describe the futile efforts of the false prophets and priests to remedy the backsliding of Israel (Jer 6 14; 8 11); here the word for "slightly" is the contemptuous term, ḳālal, which means despicably or insignificantly. In Ezk 30 21, the word "healed" is the rendering of the feminine passive part., r^{e}phū′āh and is better tr^{d} in RV "apply healing medicines." In the NT "healed" usually occurs in connection with the miracles of Our Lord and the apostles. Here it is worthy of note that St. Luke more frequently uses the vb. iaomai than therapeuō, in the proportion of 17:4, while in Mt and Mk the proportion is 4:8.

Healer (חָבַשׁ, ḥābhash) occurs once in Isa 3 7; the word lit. means a "wrapper up" or "bandager."

Alex. Macalister

HEALING, hēl′ing (מַרְפֵּא, marpē′, תְּעָלָה, t^{e}ʽālāh, כֵּהָה, kēhāh): In the OT this word is always used in its figurative sense; marpē′, which lit. means "a cure," is used in Jer 14 19 twice, and in Mal 4 2; t^{e}ʽālāh, which lit. means "an irrigation canal," here means something applied externally, as a plaster, in which sense it is used metaphorically in Jer 30 13; kēhāh occurs only in Nah 3 19 AV and is tr^{d} "assuagings" in RV.

In the NT 5 t the vb. is therapeúō; once (Acts 10 38) iáomai; in the other passages it is either iama, as in 1 Cor 12 9–30, or iasis, as in Acts 4 22, derivatives from this vb.

HEALING, GIFTS OF (χαρίσματα ἰαμάτων, charísmata iamátōn): Among the "spiritual gifts" enumerated in 1 Cor 12 4–11.28 are included "gifts of healings." See Spiritual Gifts. The subject has risen into much prominence of recent years, and so calls for separate treatment. The points to be considered are: (1) the NT facts, (2) the nature of the gifts, (3) their permanence in the church.

1. The NT Facts

The Gospels abundantly show that the ministry of Christ Himself was one of healing no less than of teaching (cf Mk 1 14 f with vs 32–34). When He sent forth the Twelve (Mk 6 7.13) and the Seventy (Lk 10 1.9), it was not only to preach the Kingdom of God but to heal the sick. The unauthentic conclusion of Mark's Gospel, if it does not preserve words actually used by Christ Himself, bears witness at all events to the traditional belief of the early church that after His departure from the world His disciples would still possess the gift of healing. The Book of Acts furnishes plentiful evidence of the exercise of this gift by apostles and other prominent men in the primitive church (Acts 3 7 f; 5 12–16; 8 7; 19 12; 28 8 f), and the Ep. of Jas refers to a ministry of healing carried on by the elders of a local church acting in their collective capacity (Jas 5 14 f). But Paul in this passage speaks of "gifts of healings" (the pl. "healings" apparently refers to the variety of ailments that were cured) as being distributed along with other spiritual gifts among the ordinary members of the church. There were men, it would seem, who occupied no official position in the community, and who might not otherwise be distinguished among their fellow-members, on whom this special chárisma of healing had been bestowed.

2. The Nature of the Gifts

On this subject the NT furnishes no direct information, but it supplies evidence from which conclusions may be drawn. We notice that the exercise of the gift is ordinarily conditional on the faith of the recipient of the blessing (Mk 6 5.6; 10 52; Acts 14 9)—faith not only in God but in the human agent (Acts 3 4 ff; 5 15; 9 17). The healer himself is a person of great faith (Mt 17 19 f), while his power of inspiring the patient with confidence points to the possession of a strong, magnetic personality. The diseases cured appear for the most part to have been not organic but functional; and many of them would now be classed as nervous disorders. The conclusion from these data is that the gifts of healing to which Paul alludes were not miraculous endowments, but natural therapeutic faculties raised to their highest power by Christian faith.

Modern psychology, by its revelation of the marvels of the subliminal self or subconscious mind and the power of "suggestion," shows how it is possible for one man to lay his hand on the very springs of personal life in another, and so discloses the psychical basis of the gift of healing. The medical science of our time, by its recognition of the dependence of the physical upon the spiritual, of the control of the bodily functions by the subconscious self, and of the physician's ability by means of suggestion, whether waking or hypnotic, to influence the subconscious soul and set free the healing powers of Nature, provides the physiological basis. And may we not add that many incontestable cases of Christian faith-cure (take as a type the well-known instance in which Luther at Weimar "tore Melanchthon," as the latter put it, "out of the very jaws of death"; see RE, XII, 520) furnish the religious basis, and prove that faith in God, working through the soul upon the body, is the mightiest of all healing influences, and that one who by his own faith and sympathy and force of personality can stir up faith in others may exercise by God's blessing the power of healing diseases?

3. Permanence of Healing Gifts in the Church

There is abundant evidence that in the early centuries the gifts of healing were still claimed and practised within the church (Justin, Apol. ii.6; Irenaeus, Adv. Haer. ii. 32, 4; Tertullian, Apol. xxiii; Origen, Contra Celsum, vii.4). The free exercise of these gifts gradually ceased, partly, no doubt, through loss of the early faith and spirituality, but partly through the growth of an ascetic temper which ignored Christ's gospel for the body and tended to the view that pain and sickness are the indispensable ministers of His gospel for the soul. All down the history of the church, however, there have been notable personalities (e.g. Francis of Assisi, Luther, Wesley) and little societies of earnest Christians (e.g. the Waldenses, the early Moravians and Quakers) who have reasserted Christ's gospel on its physical side as a gospel for sickness no less than for sin, and claimed for the gift of healing the place Paul assigned to it among the gifts of the Spirit. In recent years the subject of Christian healing has risen into importance outside of the regularly organized churches through the activity of various faith-healing movements. That the leaders of these movements have laid hold of a truth at once Scriptural and scientific there can be little doubt, though they have usually combined it with what we regard as a mistaken hostility to the ordinary practice of medicine. It is worth remembering that with all his faith in the spiritual gift of healing and personal experience of its power, Paul chose Luke the physician as the companion of his later journeys; and worth noticing that Luke shared with the apostle the honors showered upon the missionaries by the people of Melita whom they had cured of their diseases (Acts 28 10). Upon the modern church there seems to lie the duty of reaffirming the reality and permanence of the primitive gift of healing, while relating it to the scientific practice of medicine as another power ordained of God, and its natural ally in the task of diffusing the Christian gospel of health.

HEALTH, helth (שָׁלֹם, shālōm, יְשׁוּעָה, y^{e}shū‘āh, רִפְאוּת, riph'ūth, אֲרוּכָה, 'ărūkhāh; σωτηρία, sōtēría, ὑγιαίνω, hugiaínō): Shālōm is part of the formal salutation still common in Pal. In this sense it is used in Gen 43 28; 2 S 20 9; the stem word means "peace," and is used in many varieties of expression relating to security, success and good bodily health. Y^{e}shū‘āh, which specifically means deliverance or help, occurs in the refrain of Ps 42 11; 43 5, as well as in Ps 67 2; in ARV it is rendered "help." Riph'ūth is lit. "healing," and is found only in Prov 3 8. Marpē' also means healing of the body, but is used in a figurative sense as of promoting soundness of mind and moral character in Prov 4 22; 12 18; 13 17; 16 24, as also in Jer 8 15, where RV renders it "healing." 'Ărūkhāh is also used in the same figurative sense in Isa 58 8; Jer 8 22; 30 17; 33 6; lit. means "repairing or restoring"; it is the word used of the repair of the wall of Jerus by Nehemiah (ch 4).

The word "health" occurs twice in the NT: in Paul's appeal to his shipmates to take food (Acts 27 34), he says it is for their sotēria, lit. "safety"; so ARV, AV "health." The vb. hugiainō is used in 3 Jn ver 2, in the apostle's salutation to Gaius.

HEAP, hēp (עֲרֵמָה, ‘ărēmāh, גַּל, gal, נֵד, nēdh, תֵּל, tēl): "Heap" appears (1) in the simple sense of a gathering or pile, as the tr of ‘ărēmāh, a "heap," in Ruth 3 7 of grain; Neh 4 2 of stones; in 2 Ch 31 6, etc, of the tithes, etc; of ḥōmer (boiling up), a "heap"; in Ex 8 14 of frogs; of gal, a "heap"; in Job 8 17 of stones. (2) As indicating "ruin," "waste," gal (2 K 19 25; Job 15 28; Isa 25 2; 37 26; Jer 9 11; 51 37); m^{e}‘ī (Isa 17 1); ‘ī (Ps 79 1; Jer 26 18; Mic 1 6; 3 12); tēl, "mound," "hillock," "heap" (Dt 13 16; Josh 8 28; Jer 30 18 AV; 49 2). (3) Of waters, nēdh, "heap," "pile" (Ex 15 8; Josh 3 13.16; Ps 33 7; 78 13); ḥōmer (Hab 3 15, "the heap of mighty waters," RVm "surge"). (4) A cairn, or heap of stones (a) over the dead body of a dishonored person, gal (Josh 7 26; 8 29; 2 S 18 17); (b) as a witness or boundary-heap (Gen 31 46 f, Gal‘ēdh [Galeed] in Heb, also miçpāh, "watch tower," Y^{e}ghar-Sāhădhūthā' [Jegar-sahadutha] in Aram., both words meaning "the heap of witness"; see Gen 31 47.49 RV). (5) As a way mark, tamrūrīm, from tāmar, "to stand erect" (Jer 31 21 AV, "Set thee up waymarks, make thee high heaps," RV "guide-posts," a more likely tr).

"To heap" represents various single words: ḥāthāh, "to take," "to take hold of," with one exception, applied to fire or burning coals (Prov 25 22, "Thou wilt heap coals of fire upon his head," "Thou wilt take coals of fire [and heap them] on his head"); sāphāh, "to add" (Dt 32 23); çābhar, "to heap up" (Hab 1 10); kābhaç, "to press together" (with the fingers or hand) (Hab 2 5); rābhāh, "to multiply" (Ezk 24 10); episōreúō, "to heap up upon" (2 Tim 4 3, they "will heap to themselves teachers after their own lusts"); sōreúō, "to heap up" (Rom 12 20, "Thou shalt heap coals of fire upon his head"); thēsaurízō, "to lay up" (as treasure) (Jas 5 3 AV, "Ye have heaped treasure together," RV "laid up"); çābhar, "to heap up," "to heap" or "store up" (Job 27 16, "silver"; Ps 39 6, "riches"; Zec 9 3, "silver"); sūm, sīm "to place," "set," "put" (Job 36 13 AV, "The hypocrites in heart heap up wrath," RV "They that are godless in heart lay up anger"). In Jgs 15 16 we have ḥămōr, ḥămōrothāyim, "with the jawbone of an ass, heaps upon heaps," RVm "heap, two heaps"; one of Samson's sayings; ḥămōr means "an ass," ḥōmer "a heap."

For "heap up words" (Job 16 4), RV has "join together"; for "shall be a heap" (Isa 17 11), "fleeth away," m "shall be a heap"; "heap" for "number" (Nah 3 3); ERV "heap of stones" for "sling," m as AV and ARV (Prov 26 8); "in one heap" for "upon a heap" (Josh 3 16); "he heapeth up [dust]" for "they shall heap" (Hab 1 10).

HEART, härt (לֵב, lēbh, לֵבָב, lēbhābh; καρδία, kardía): The different senses in which the word occurs in the OT and the NT may be grouped under the following heads:

1. Various Meanings

It represents in the first place the bodily organ, and by easy transition those experiences which affect or are affected by the body. Fear, love, courage, anger, joy, sorrow, hatred are always ascribed to the heart—esp. in the OT; thus courage for which usually rū^{a}ḥ is used (Ps 27 14); joy (Ps 4 7); anger (Dt 19 6, "while his heart is hot," lēbhābh); fear (1 S 25 37); sorrow (Ps 13 2), etc.

Hence naturally it came to stand for the man himself (Dt 7 17; "say in thine heart," Isa 14 13).

2. Heart and Personality

As representing the man himself, it was considered to be the seat of the emotions and passions and appetites (Gen 18 5; Lev 19 17; Ps 104 15), and embraced likewise the intellectual and moral faculties—though these are necessarily ascribed to the "soul" as well. This distinction is not always observed.

3. Soul and Heart

"Soul" in Heb can never be rendered by "heart"; nor can "heart" be considered as a synonym for "soul." Cremer has well observed: "The Heb nephesh ("soul") is never tr^d kardia ("heart"). . . . . The range of the Heb nephesh, to which the Gr psuchē alone corresponds, differs so widely from the ideas connected with psuchē, that utter confusion would have ensued had psuchē been employed in an unlimited degree for lēbh ("heart"). The Bib. lēbh never, like psuchē, denotes the personal subject, nor could it do so. That which in classical Gr is ascribed to psuchē [a good soul, a just soul, etc] is in the Bible ascribed to the heart alone and cannot be otherwise" (Cremer, Lexicon, art. "Kardia," 437 ff, German ed).

4. Center of Vital Action

In the heart vital action is centered (1 K 21 7). "Heart," except as a bodily organ, is never ascribed to animals, as is the case sometimes with nephesh and rū^{a}ḥ (Lev 17 11, nephesh; Gen 2 19; Nu 16 22; Gen 7 22, rū^{a}ḥ). "Heart" is thus often used interchangeably with these two (Gen 41 8; Ps 86 4; 119 20); but "it never denotes the personal subject, always the personal organ."

5. Heart and Mind

As the central organ in the body, forming a focus for its vital action, it has come to stand for the center of its moral, spiritual, intellectual life. "In particular the heart is the place in which the process of self-consciousness is carried out, in which the soul is at home with itself, and is conscious of all its doing and suffering as its own" (Oehler). Hence it is that men of "courage" are called "men of the heart"; that the Lord is said to speak "in his heart" (Gen 8 21); that men "know in their own heart" (Dt 8 5); that "no one considereth in his heart' (Isa 44 19 AV). "Heart" in this connection is sometimes rendered "mind," as in Nu 16 28 ("of mine own mind," Vulg ex proprio corde, LXX ap' emautoú); the foolish "is void of understanding," i.e. "heart" (Prov 6 32, where the LXX renders phrenôn, Vulg cordis, Luther "der ist ein Narr"). God is represented as "searching the heart" and "trying the reins" (Jer 17 10 AV). Thus "heart" comes to stand for "conscience," for which there is no word in Heb, as in Job 27 6, "My heart shall not reproach me," or in 1 S 24 5, "David's heart smote him"; cf 1 S 25 31. From this it appears, in the words of Owen: "The heart in Scripture is variously used, sometimes for the mind and understanding, sometimes for the will, sometimes for the affections, sometimes for the conscience, sometimes for the whole soul. Generally, it denotes the whole soul of man and all the faculties of it, not absolutely, but as they are all one principle of moral operations, as they all concur in our doing of good and evil."

6. Figurative Senses

The radical corruption of human nature is clearly taught in Scripture and brought into connection with the heart. It is "uncircumcised" (Jer 9 26; Ezk 44 7; cf Acts 7 51); and "hardened" (Ex 4 21); "wicked" (Prov 26 23); "perverse" (Prov 11 20); "godless" (Job 36 13); "deceitful and desperately wicked" (Jer 17 9 AV). It defiles the whole man (Mt 15 19.20); resists, as in the case of Pharaoh, the repeated call of God (Ex 7 13). There, however, the law of God is written (Rom 2 15); there the work of grace is wrought (Acts 15 9), for the "heart" may be "renewed" by grace (Ezk 36 26), because the "heart" is the seat of sin (Gen 6 5; 8 21).

7. Process of Heart Renewal

This process of heart-renewal is indicated in various ways. It is the removal of a "stony heart" (Ezk 11 19). The heart becomes "clean" (Ps 51 10); "fixed" (Ps 112 7) through "the fear" of the Lord (ver 1); "With the heart man believeth" (Rom 10 10); on the "heart" the power of God is exercised for renewal (Jer 31 33). To God the bereaved apostles pray as a knower of the heart (Acts 1 24—a word not known to classical writers, found only here in the NT and in Acts 15 8, kardiognôstēs). In the "heart" God's Spirit dwells with might (Eph 3 16, eis tón ésō ánthrōpon); in the "heart" God's love is poured forth (Rom 5 5). The Spirit of His son has been "sent forth into the heart" (Gal 4 6); the "earnest of the Spirit" has been given "in the heart" (2 Cor 1 22). In the work of grace, therefore, the heart occupies a position almost unique.

8. The Heart First

We might also refer here to the command, on which both the OT and NT revelation of love is based: "Thou shalt love Jeh thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might" (Dt 6 5); where "heart" always takes the first place, and is the term which in the NT rendering remains unchanged (cf Mt 22 37; Mk 12 30.33; Lk 10 27, where "heart" always takes precedence).

9. A Term for "Deepest"

A bare reference may be made to the employment of the term for that which is innermost, hidden, deepest in anything (Ex 15 8; Jon 2 3), the very center of things. This we find in all languages. Cf Eph 3 16.17, "in the inward man," as above.

J. I. MARAIS

HEARTH, härth: Occurs 7 t in AV: Gen 18 6; Ps 102 3; Isa 30 14; Jer 36 22.23 bis; Zec 12 6; 4 t in RV: Lev 6 9; Isa 30 14; Ezk 43 15.16 ("altar hearth"); cf also Isa 29 1 RVm. It will be noted that the renderings of the two VSS agree in only one passage (Isa 30 14).

(1) The hearth in case of a tent was nothing more than a depression in the ground in which fire was kindled for cooking or for warmth. Cakes were baked, after the fashion of Gen 18 6, in the ashes or upon hot stones. In this passage, however, there is nothing in the Heb corresponding to AV "on the hearth." In the poorer class of houses also the hearth consisted of such a depression, of varying dimensions, in the middle or in one corner of the room. There was no chimney for the smoke, which escaped as it could, or through a latticed opening for the purpose (the "chimney" of Hos 13 3). While the nature of the hearth is thus clear enough, more or less uncertainty attaches to specific terms used in the Heb. In Isa 30 14 the expression means simply "that which is kindled," referring to the bed of live coals. From this same vb. (yāḳadh, "be kindled") are formed the nouns mōḳēdh (Ps 102 3 [Heb 4]) and mōḳ^{e}dhāh (Lev 6 9 [Heb 2]), which might, according to their formation, mean either the material kindled or the place where a fire is kindled. Hence the various renderings, "firebrand," "hearth," etc. Moreover in Lev 6 9[2] the termination -āh of mōḳ^{e}dhāh may be taken as the pronominal suffix, "its"; hence RVm "on its firewood."

(2) Two other terms have reference to heating in the better class of houses. In Jer 36 22.23 the word ('āḥ) means a "brazier" of burning coals, with which Jehoiakim's "winter house" was heated. The same purpose was served by the "pan [kiyyōr] of fire" of Zec 12 6 RV, apparently a wide, shallow vessel otherwise used for cooking (1 S 2 14, EV "pan"), or as a wash basin (cf Ex 30 18; 1 K 7 38, etc, "laver").

(3) Another class of passages is referred to the signification "altar hearth," which seems to have been a term applied to the top of the altar of burnt offering. The mōḳedhāh of Lev 6 9 [2], though related by derivation to the words discussed under (1) above, belongs here (cf also Ecclus 50 12, "by the hearth of the altar," παρ' ἐσχάρᾳ βωμοῦ, par' eschára bōmoú). Again in Ezekiel's description of the altar of the restored temple (43 15.16), he designates the top of the altar by a special term (RVm ariel), which is by most understood to mean "altar hearth" (so RV). With this may be compared the symbolical name given to Jerus (Isa 29 1), and variously explained as "lion [or lioness] of God," or "hearth of God."

HEARTILY, här'ti-li: Occurs (Col 3 23) as the tr of ἐκ ψυχῆς, ek psuchḗs, "out of the soul," "Whatsoever ye do, do it heartily as unto the Lord [who sees the heart and recompenses "whatsoever good thing a man does"] and not unto men" (however they, your masters according to the flesh, may regard it); RV "work heartily," m "Gr from the soul."

In 2 Macc 4 37, we have "Antiochus was heartily sorry," psuchikṓs ("from the soul").

1. Dreaded in Pal

HEAT, hēt (חֹם, ḥōm, חֹרֶב, hōrebh, "drought," Job 30 30; Isa 4 6; 25 4; Jer 36 30; שָׁרָב, shārābh, Isa 49 10, tr^d^ in RVm "mirage"; ζεστός, zestós, "fervent," Rev 3 15, θέρμη, thérmē, Acts 28 3, καῦμα, kaúma, Rev 7 16, καύσων, kaúsōn, Mt 20 12; see Mirage): The heat of the summer is greatly dreaded in Pal, and as a rule the people rest under cover during the middle of the day, when the sun is hottest. There is no rain from May to October, and scarcely a cloud in the sky to cool the air or to screen off the burning vertical rays of the sun. The first word of advice given to visitors to the country is to protect themselves from the sun. Even on the mountains, where the temperature of the air is lower, the sun is perhaps more fierce, owing to the lesser density of the atmosphere.

2. Causes Disease

This continuous summer heat often causes sunstroke, and the glare causes diseases of the eye which affect a large percentage of the people of Pal and Egypt.

3. Relief Sought

It is to be expected that in these times of heat and drought the ideal pleasure has come to be to sit in the shade by some cool flowing fountain. In the mountains the village which has the coolest spring of water is the most desired. These considerations give renewed meaning to the passages: "as cold waters to a thirsty soul" (Prov 25 25); "He maketh me to lie down in green pastures; he leadeth me beside still waters" (Ps 23 2). What a blessing to be "under the shadow of the Almighty" (Ps 91 1), where "the sun shall not strike upon them, nor any heat" (Rev 7 16)!

4. Midday Heat

The middle of the day is often referred to as the "heat of the day" (1 S 11 11). It made a great difference to the army whether it could win the battle before the midday heat. Saladin won the great battle at Hattin by taking advantage of this fact. It was a particular time of the day when it was the custom to rest. "They came about the heat of the day to the house of Ish-bosheth, as he took his rest at noon" (2 S 4 5). Jeh appeared to Abraham as "he sat in the tent door in the heat of the day" (Gen 18 1). The hardship of working throughout the day is expressed in Mt 20 12, "who have borne the burden of the day and scorching heat." Sometimes just after sunrise the contrast of the cold of night and the heat of the sun is esp. noticeable. "The sun ariseth with the scorching wind" (Jas 1 11).

5. Summer Heat

In summer the wind is usually from the S.W., but in case it is from the S. it is sure to be hot. "When ye see a south wind blowing, ye say, There will be a scorching heat" (Lk 12 55). The heat on a damp, sultry day, when the atmosphere is full of dust haze is esp. oppressive, and is referred to in Isa 25 5 as "the heat by the shade of a cloud." The heat of summer melts the snow on the mountains and causes all vegetation to dry up and wither. Ice and snow vanish in the heat thereof (Job 6 17), "Drought and heat consume the snow waters" (Job 24 19). But the "tree planted by the waters, that spreadeth out its roots by the river . . . . shall not fear when heat cometh, but its leaf shall be green" (Jer 17 8).

6. Figurative Uses

The word is used often in connection with anger in the Scriptures: "hot anger" (Ex 11 8); "hot displeasure" (Dt 9 19); "anger of the Lord was hot against Israel" (Jgs 2 14 AV); "thine anger from waxing hot" (Ps 85 3 AVm); "I know thy works, that thou art neither cold nor hot" (Rev 3 15).

HEAVENLY, hev''n-li (οὐράνιος, ouránios, ἐπουράνιος, epouránios): Pertaining to heaven or the heavens. See Heavens. The phrase tá epouránia, tr^d^ "heavenly things" in Jn 3 12; He 8 5; 9 23, but in Eph "heavenly places" (1 3.20; 2 6; 3 10; 6 12), has shades of meaning defined by the context. In Jn 3 12, in contrast with "earthly things" (i.e. such as can be brought to the test of experience), it denotes truths known only through revelation (God's love in salvation). In He the sense is local. In Eph it denotes the sphere of spiritual privilege in Christ, save in 6 12, where it stands for the unseen spiritual world, in which both good and evil forces operate. It is always the sphere of the super-earthly.

HEAVENS, hev''nz (שָׁמַיִם, shāmayīm; οὐρανοί, ouranoí): On the physical heavens see Astronomy; World. Above these, in popular conception, were the celestial heavens, the abode of God and of the hosts of angels (Ps 11 4; 103 19–21; Isa 66 1; Rev 4 2; 5 11; cf Dnl 7 10), though it was recognized that Jeh's presence was not confined to any region (1 K 8 27). Later Judaism reckoned seven heavens. The apostle Paul speaks of himself as caught up into "the third heaven," which he evidently identifies with Paradise (2 Cor 12 2). See Heavenly.

1. Eschatological Idea

The formal conception of new heavens and a new earth occurs in Isa 65 17; 66 22; 2 Pet 3 13; Rev 21 1 (where "heaven," singular). The idea in substance is also found in Isa 51 16; Mt 19 28; 2 Cor 5 17; He 12 26–28. In each case the reference is eschatological, indeed the adj. "new" seems to have acquired in this and other connections a semi-technical eschatological sense. It must be remembered that the OT has no single word for "universe," and that the phrase "heaven and earth" serves to supply the deficiency. The promise of a new heavens and a new earth is therefore equivalent to a promise of world renewal.

2. Earliest National Type

It is a debated question how old in the history of revelation this promise is. Isaiah is the prophet with whom the idea first occurs in explicit form, and that in passages which many critics would assign to the post-exilic period (the so-called Trito-Isaiah). In general, until recently, the trend of criticism has been to represent the universalistic-cosmic type of eschatology as developed out of the particularistic-national type by a gradual process of widening of the horizon of prophecy, a view which would put the emergence of the former at a comparatively late date. More recently, however, Gressmann (Der Ursprung der israelitisch-jüdischen Eschatologie, 1905) and others have endeavored to show that often even prophecies belonging to the latter type embody material and employ means of expression which presuppose acquaintance with the idea of a world-catastrophe at the end. On this view the world-eschatology would have, from ancient times, existed alongside of the more narrowly confined outlook, and would be even older than the latter. These writers further assume that the cosmic eschatology was not indigenous among the Hebrews, but of oriental (Bab) origin, a theory which they apply not only to the more developed system of the later apocalyptic writings, but also to its preformations in the OT. The cosmic eschatology is not believed to have been the distinctive property of the great ethical prophets, but rather a commonly current mythological belief to which the prophets refer without formally endorsing it.

3. Different from Mythological Theory

Its central thought is said to have been the belief that the end of the world-process must correspond to the beginning, that consequently the original condition of things, when heaven and earth were new, must repeat itself at some future point, and the state of paradise with its concomitants return, a belief supposed to have rested on certain astronomical observations.

4. Antiquity of Cosmical Conception

While this theory in the form presented is unproven and unacceptable, it deserves credit for having focused attention on certain phenomena in the OT which clearly show that Messianic prophecy, and particularly the world-embracing scope which it assumes in some predictions, is far older than modern criticism had been willing to concede. The OT from the beginning has an eschatology and puts the eschatological promise on the broadest racial basis (Gen 3). It does not first ascend from Israel to the new humanity, but at the very outset takes its point of departure in the race and from this descends to the election of Israel, always keeping the universalistic goal in clear view. Also in the earliest accounts, already elements of a cosmical universalism find their place side by side with those of a racial kind, as when Nature is represented as sharing in the consequences of the fall of man.

5. The Cosmical Dependent on the Ethico-Religious

As regards the antiquity of the universalistic and cosmical eschatology, therefore, the conclusions of these writers may be registered as a gain, while on the two other points of the pagan origin and the unethical character of the expectation involved, dissent from them should be expressed. According to the OT, the whole idea of world-renewal is of strictly supernatural origin, and in it the cosmical follows the ethical hope. The cosmical eschatology is simply the correlate of the fundamental Bib. principle that the issues of the world-process depend on the ethico-religious developments in the history of man (cf 2 Pet 3 13).

6. The End Correspondent to the Beginning

But the end correspondent to the beginning is likewise a true Scriptural principle, which the theory in question has helped to reëmphasize, although there is this difference, that Scripture does not look forward to a repetition of the same process, but to a restoration of the primeval harmony on a higher plane such as precludes all further disturbance. In the passages above cited, there are clear reminiscences of the account of creation (Isa 51 16, "that I may plant the heavens, and lay the foundations of the earth"; 65 17, "I create new heavens and a new earth"; 2 Pet 3 13 compared with vs 4–6; Rev 21 1 compared with the imagery of paradise throughout the chapter). Besides this, where the thought of the renewal of earth is met with in older prophecy, this is depicted in colors of the state of paradise (Isa 11 6–9; Hos 2 18–21). The "regeneration" (palingenesía) of Mt 19 28 also points back to the first genesis of the world. The 'inhabited earth to come' (oikouménē méllousa) of He 2 5 occurs at the opening of a context throughout which the account of Gen 1–3 evidently stood before the writer's mind.

7. The Cosmical Heavens: He 12: 26–29

In the combination "new heavens and a new earth," the term "heavens" must therefore be taken in the sense imposed upon it by the story of creation, where "heavens" designates not the celestial habitation of God, but the cosmical heavens, the region of the supernal waters, sun moon and stars. The Bible nowhere suggests that there is anything abnormal or requiring renewal in God's dwelling-place (He 9 23 is of a different import). In Rev 21, where "the new heaven and the new earth" appear, it is at the same time stated that the new Jerus comes down from God out of heaven (cf vs 1.2.10). In He 12 26–28 also the implication is that only the lower heavens are subject to renewal. The "shaking" that accompanies the new covenant and corresponds to the shaking of the law-giving at Sinai, is a shaking of "not the earth only, but also the heaven." This shaking, in its reference to heaven as well as to earth, signifies a removal of the things shaken. But from the things thus shaken and removed (including heaven), the writer distinguishes "those things which are not shaken," which are destined to remain, and these are identified with the kingdom of God. The kingdom of God, however, according to the general trend of the teaching of the epistle, has its center in the heavenly world. The words "that have been made," in ver 27, do not assign their created character as the reason why heaven and earth can be shaken, an exegesis which would involve us in the difficulty that among that which remains there is something uncreated besides God; the true construction and correct paraphrase are: "as of things that were made with the thought in the mind of God that those things which cannot be shaken may remain," i.e. already at creation God contemplated an unchangeable universe as the ultimate, higher state of things.

8. Palingenesis: Mt 19:28

In Mt 19 28 the term palingenesia marks the world-renewing as the renewal of an abnormal state of things. The Scripture teaching, therefore, is that around the center of God's heaven, which is not subject to deterioration or renewal, a new cosmical heaven and a new earth will be established to be the dwelling-place of the eschatological humanity. The light in which the promise thus appears reminds us that the renewed kosmos, earth as well as cosmical heavens, is destined to play a permanent (not merely provisional, on the principle of chiliasm) part in the future life of the people of God. This is in entire harmony with the prevailing Bib. representation, not only in the OT but likewise in the NT (cf Mt 5 5; He 2 5), although in the Fourth Gospel and in the Pauline Epp. the emphasis is to such an extent thrown on the heaven-centered character of the future life that the rôle to be played in it by the renewed earth recedes into the background. Rev, on the other hand, recognizes this element in its imagery of "the new Jerus" coming down from God out of heaven upon earth.

9. A Purified Universe

That the new heavens and the new earth are represented as the result of a "creation" does not necessarily involve a production ex nihilo. The terms employed in 2 Pet 3 6–13 seem rather to imply that the renewal will out of the old produce a purified universe, whence also the catastrophe is compared to that of the Deluge. As then the old world perished by water and the present world arose out of the flood, so in the end-crisis "the heavens shall be dissolved by fire and the elements melt with fervent heat," to give rise to the new heaven and the new earth in which righteousness dwells. The term palingenesia (Mt 19 28) points to renewal, not to creation de novo. The Talm also teaches that the world will pass through a process of purification, although at the same time it seems to break up the continuity between this and the coming world by the phantastic assumption that the new heavens and the new earth of Isa 65 17 were created at the close of the Hexemeron of Gen 1. This was inferred from the occurrence of the article in Isa 66 22, "the new heavens and the new earth."

GEERHARDUS VOS

HEAVY, hev′i, HEAVINESS, hev′i-nes (כָּבֵד, kābhēdh, דְּאָגָה, *d*ᵉ*'āghāh;* λύπη, lúpē):

1. Literal

Heavy (heave, to lift) is used lit. with respect to material things, as the tr of kōbhēdh, "heaviness" (Prov 27 3, "a stone is heavy"); of kābhēdh, "to be weighty" (1 S 4 18; 2 S 14 26; Lam 3 7); of 'āmaṣ, "to load" (Isa 46 1 AV; cf Mt 26 43; Mk 14 40; Lk 9 32, "Their eyes were heavy"); baréomai, "to be weighed down."

2. Figuratively

It is used (1) for what is hard to bear, oppressive, kābhēdh (Ex 18 18; Nu 11 14; 1 S 5 6.11; Ps 38 4; Isa 24 20); mōṭāh, a "yoke" (Isa 58 6, RV "bands of the yoke"); ḳāsheh, "sharp," "hard" (1 K 14 6, "heavy tidings"); barús, "heavy" (Mt 23 4); (2) for sad, sorrowful (weighed down), mar, "bitter" (Prov 31 6, RV "bitter"); ra', "evil" (Prov 25 20); adēmonéō, lit. "to be sated," "wearied," then, "to be very heavy," "dejected" (Mt 26 37, of Our Lord in Gethsemane, "[he] began to be sorrowful and very heavy," RV "sore troubled"); "adēmonein denotes a kind of stupefaction and bewilderment, the intellectual powers reeling and staggering under the pressure of the ideas presented to them" (Mason, The Conditions of Our Lord's Life on Earth); cf Mk 14 33; (3) morose, sulky, as well as sad, ṣar, "sullen," "sour," "angry" (1 K 20 43; 21 4, "heavy and displeased"); (4) dull, kābhēdh (Isa 6 10, "make their ears heavy"; 59 1, "neither [is] his ear heavy"); (5) "tired" seems to be the meaning in Ex 17 12, "Moses' hands were heavy" (kābhēdh); cf Mt 26 43 and ‖s above.

Heavily is the tr of *k*ᵉ*bhēdhuth*, "heaviness" (Ex 14 25), meaning "with difficulty"; of ḳādhar, "to be black," "to be a mourner" (Ps 35 14 AV, RV "I bowed down mourning"); of kābhēdh (Isa 47 6).

Heaviness has always the sense of anxiety, sorrow, grief, etc; *d*ᵉ*'āghāh*, "fear," "dread," "anxious care" (Prov 12 25, "Heaviness in the heart of a man maketh it stoop," RVm "or care"); kēhāh, "to be feeble," "weak" (Isa 61 3, "the spirit of heaviness"); pānīm, "face," "aspect" (Job 9 27 AV, "I will leave off my heaviness," RV "[sad] countenance"; cf 2 Esd 5 16; Wisd 17 4; Ecclus 25 23); ta'ănīyāh, from 'ānāh, "to groan," "to sigh" (Isa 29 2, RV "mourning and lamentation"); tūghāh, "sadness," "sorrow" (Ps 119 28; Prov 10 1; 14 13); ta'ănīth, "affliction of one's self," "fasting" (Ezr 9 5, RV "humiliation," m "fasting"); katḗpheia, "dejection," "sorrow" (lit. "of the eyes") (Jas 4 9, "your joy [turned] to heaviness"); lupē, "grief" (Rom 9 2, RV "great sorrow"; 2 Cor 2 1, RV "sorrow"); lupéomai (1 Pet 1 6, RV "put to grief"); for nūsh, "to be sick," "feeble" (Ps 69 20, RVm "sore sick"), and adēmoneō (Phil 2 26 RV "sore troubled"), AV has "full of heaviness." "Heaviness," in the sense of sorrow, sadness, occurs in 2 Esd 10 7.8.24; Tob 2 5; lupē (Ecclus 22 4, RV "grief"; 30 21, "Give not thy soul to heaviness," RV "sorrow"; 1 Macc 6 4); lupeō (Ecclus 30 9, RV "will grieve thee"; pénthos (1 Macc 3 51, etc).

RV has "heavier work" for "more work" (Ex 5 9); "heavy upon men" for "common among men" (Eccl 6 1); for "were heavy loaden" (Isa 46 1), "are made a load"; for "the burden thereof is heavy" (Isa 30 27), "in thick rising smoke."

HEBER, hē′bẽr (חֶבֶר, ḥebher, "associate" or, possibly, "enchanter"; Ἔβερ, Éber): A name occurring several times in the OT as the name of an individual or of a clan.

(1) A member of the tribe of Asher and son of Beraiah (Gen 46 17; Nu 26 45; 1 Ch 7 31 f).

(2) A Kenite, husband of Jael, who deceptively slew Sisera, captain of the army of Jabin, a Canaanite king (Jgs 4 17; 5 24). He had separated himself from the main body of the Kenites, which accounts for his tent being near Kedesh, the place of Sisera's disastrous battle (Jgs 4 11).

(3) Head of a clan of Judah, and son of Mered by his Jewish, as distinguished from an Egyp, wife. He was father, or founder, of Soco (1 Ch 4 18).

(4) A Benjamite, or clan or family of Elpaal belonging to Benjamin (1 Ch 8 17).

(5) Heber, of Our Lord's genealogy (Lk 3 35 AV), better, Eber.

So, the name "Eber," עֵבֶר, 'ēbher, in 1 Ch 5 13; 8 22, is not to be confused with Heber, חֶבֶר, ḥebher, as in the foregoing passages.

EDWARD BAGBY POLLARD

HEBERITES, hē′bẽr-īts (הַחֶבְרִי, ha-ḥebhrī): Descendants of Heber, a prominent clan of Asher, (Nu 26 45). Supposed by some to be connected with the Ḥabiri of the Am Tab.

HEBREW, hē′brōō, HEBREWESS, hē′brōō-es (עִבְרִי, 'ibhrī, fem. עִבְרִיָּה, 'ibhrīyāh; Ἑβραῖος, Hebraíos): The earliest name for Abraham (Gen 14 13) and his descendants (Joseph, Gen 39 14.17; 40 15; 41 12; 43 32; Israelites in Egypt, Ex 1 15; 2 6.11.13; 3 18; in laws, Ex 21 2; Dt 15 12; in history, 1 S 4 6.9; 13 7.19, etc; later, Jer 34 9, "Hebrewess," 14; Jon 1 9; in the NT, Acts 6 1; 2 Cor 11 22; Phil 3 5). The etymology of the word is disputed. It may be derived from Eber (Gen 10 21.24.25, etc), or, as some think, from the vb. עָבַר, 'ābhar, "to cross over" (people from across the Euphrates; cf Josh 24 2). A connection is sought by some with the apri or epri of the Egyp monuments, and again with the Habiri of the Am Tab. In Acts 6 1, the "Hebrews" are contrasted with "Hellenists," or Gr-speaking Jews. By the "Heb" tongue in the NT (Hebraïstí, Jn 5 2; 19 13.17.20; 20 16) is meant ARAMAIC (q.v.), but also in Rev 9 11; 16 16, Heb proper.

LITERATURE

I. Title.—In AV and ERV the title of this book describes it as "the Epistle of Paul the Apostle to the Hebrews." Modern scholarship has disputed the applicability of every word of this title. Neither does it appear in the oldest MSS, where we find simply "to Hebrews" (prós Hebraíous). This, too, seems to have been prefixed to the original writing by a collector or copyist. It is too vague and general for the author to have used it. And there is nothing in the body of the book which affirms any part of either title. Even the shorter title was an inference from the general character of the writing. Nowhere is criticism less hampered by problems of authenticity and inspiration. No question arises, at least directly, of pseudonymity either of author or of readers, for both are anonymous. For the purpose of tracing the history and interpreting the meaning of the book, the absence of a title, or of any definite historical data, is a disadvantage. We are left to infer its historical context from a few fragments of uncertain tradition, and from such general references to historical conditions as the document itself contains. Where no date, name or well-known event is fixed, it becomes impossible to decide, among many possibilities, what known historical conditions, if any, are presupposed. Yet this very fact, of the book's detachment from personal and historical incidents, renders it more self-contained, and its exegesis less dependent upon understanding the exact historical situation. But its general relation to the thought of its time must be taken into account if we are to understand it at all.

1. The Author's Culture and Style

II. Literary Form.—The writer was evidently a man of culture, who had a masterly command of the Gr language. The theory of Clement of Alexandria, that the work was a tr from Heb, was merely an inference from the supposition that it was first addressed to Heb-speaking Christians. It bears none of the marks of a tr. It is written in pure idiomatic Gr. The writer had an intimate knowledge of the LXX, and was familiar with Jewish life. He was well-read in Hellenic lit. (e.g. Wisd), and had probably made a careful study of Philo (see VI below). His argument proceeds continuously and methodically, in general, though not strict, accord with the rules of Gr rhetoric, and without the interruptions and digressions which render Paul's arguments so hard to follow. "Where the literary skill of the author comes out is in the deft adjustment of the argumentative to the hortatory sections" (Moffatt, Intro, 424 f). He has been classed with Lk as the most "cultured" of the early Christian writers.

2. Letter, Epistle or Treatise?

It has been questioned whether He is rightly called a letter at all. Unlike all Paul's letters, it opens without any personal note of address or salutation; and at the outset it sets forth, in rounded periods and in philosophical language, the central theme which is developed throughout. In this respect it resembles the Johannine writings alone in the NT. But as the argument proceeds, the personal note of application, exhortation and expostulation emerges more clearly (2 1; 3 1–12; 4 1.14; 5 11; 6 9; 10 9; 13 7); and it ends with greetings and salutations (13 18 ff). The writer calls it "a word of exhortation." The vb. epésteila (RV "I have written") is the usual expression for writing a letter (13 22). Hebrews begins like an essay, proceeds like a sermon, and ends as a letter.

Deissmann, who distinguishes between a "true letter," the genuine personal message of one man to another, and an "epistle," or a treatise written in imitation of the form of a letter, but with an eye on the reading public, puts He in the latter class; nor would he "consider it anything but a literary oration—hence not as an epistle at all—if the epesteila, and the greetings at the close, did not permit of the supposition that it had at one time opened with something of the nature of an address as well" (Bible Studies, 49–50). There is no textual or historical evidence of any opening address having ever stood as part of the text; nor does the opening section bear any mark or suggestion of fragmentariness, as if it had once followed such an address.

Yet the supposition that a greeting once stood at the beginning of our document is not so impossible as Zahn thinks (Intro to the NT, II, 313 f), as a comparison with Jas or 1 Pet will show.

So unusual is the phenomenon of a letter without a greeting, that among the ancients, Pantaenus had offered the explanation that Paul, out of modesty, had refrained from putting his name to a letter addressed to the Hebrews, because the Lord Himself had been apostle to them.

In recent times, Jülicher and Harnack have conjectured that the author intentionally suppressed the greeting, either from motives of prudence at a time of persecution, or because it was unnecessary, since the bearer of the letter would communicate the name of the sender to the recipients.

Fr. Overbeck advanced the more revolutionary hypothesis that the letter once opened with a greeting, but from someone other than Paul; that in order to satisfy the general conditions of canonization, the non-apostolic greeting was struck out by the Alexandrians, and the personal references in 13 22–25 added, in order to represent it as Pauline.

3. A Unity or a Composite Writing?

W. Wrede, starting from this theory, rejects the first part of it and adopts the second. He does not base his hypothesis on the conditions of canonization, but on an examination of the writing itself. He adopts Deissmann's rejected alternative, and argues that the main part of the book was originally not an epistle at all, but a general doctrinal treatise. Then ch 13, and esp. vs 18 ff, were added by a later hand, in order to represent the whole as a Pauline letter, and the book in its final form was made, after all, pseudonymous. The latter supposition is based upon an assumed reference to imprisonment in 13 19 (cf Philem ver 22) and upon the reference to Timothy in 13 23 (cf Phil 2 19); and the proof that these professed Pauline phrases are not really Pauline is found in a supposed contradiction between 13 19 and 13 23. But ver 19 does not necessarily refer to imprisonment exclusively or even at all, and therefore it stands in no contradiction with ver 23 (cf Rom 1 9–13). And Timothy must have associated with many Christian leaders besides Paul. But why should anybody who wanted to represent the letter as Pauline and who scrupled not to add to it for that purpose, refrain from the obvious device of prefixing a Pauline greeting? Moreover, it is only by the most forced special pleading that it can be maintained that chs 1–12 are a mere doctrinal treatise, devoid of all evidences of a personal relation to a circumscribed circle of readers. The period and manner of the readers' conversion are defined (2 3 f). Their present spiritual condition is described in terms of such anxiety and hope as betoken a very intimate personal relation (5 11 f; 6 9–11). Their past conflicts, temptations, endurance and triumph are recalled for their encouragement under present trials, and both past and present are defined in particular terms that point to concrete situations well known to writer and readers (10 32–36). There is, it is true, not in He the same intense and all-pervading personal note as appears in the earlier Pauline letters; the writer often loses sight of his particular audience and develops his argument in detached and abstract form. But it cannot be assumed that nothing is a letter which does not conform to the Pauline model. And the presence of long, abstract arguments does not justify the excision or explaining away of undoubted personal passages. Neither the language nor the logic of the book either demands or permits the separation of doctrinal and personal passages from one another, so as to leave for residuum a mere doctrinal treatise. Doctrinal statements lead up to personal exhortations, and personal exhortations form the transition to new arguments; they are indissolubly involved in one another; and ch 13 presents no such exceptional features as to justify its separation from the whole work. There is really no reason, but the unwarrantable assumption that an ancient writer must have conformed with a certain convention of letter-writing, to forbid the acceptance of He for what it appears to be—a defence of Christianity written for the benefit of definite readers, growing more intimate and personal as the writer gathers his argument into a practical appeal to the hearts and consciences of his readers.

1. Tradition

III. The Author.—Certain coincidences of language and thought between this epistle and that of Clement of Rome to the Corinthians justify the inference that He was known in Rome toward the end of the 1st cent. AD (cf He 11 7.31 and 1 3 ff with Clem ad Cor 9.12.36). Clement makes no explicit reference to the book or its author: the quotations are unacknowledged. But they show that He already had some authority in Rome. The same inference is supported by similarities of expression found also in the Shepherd of Hermas. The possible marks of its influence in Polycarp and Justin Martyr are too uncertain and indefinite to justify any inference. Its name does not appear in the list of NT writings compiled and acknowledged by Marcion, nor in that of the Muratorian Fragment. The latter definitely assigns letters by Paul to only seven churches, and so inferentially excludes He.

When the book emerges into the clear light of history toward the end of the 2d cent., the tradition as to its authorship is seen to divide into three different streams.

(1) In Alexandria, it was regarded as in some sense the work of Paul. Clement tells how his teacher, apparently Pantaenus, explained why Paul does not in this letter, as in others, address his readers under his name. Out of reverence for the Lord (II, 2, above) and to avoid suspicion and prejudice, he as apostle of the Gentiles refrains from addressing himself to the Hebrews as their apostle. Clement accepts this explanation, and adds to it that the original Heb of Paul's epistle had been tr^d into Gr by Luke. That Paul wrote in Heb was assumed from the tradition or inference that the letter was addressed to Aram.-speaking Hebrews. Clement also had noticed the dissimilarity of its Gr from that of Paul's epistles, and thought he found a resemblance to that of Acts.

Origen starts with the same tradition, but he knew, moreover, that other churches did not accept the Alexandrian view, and that they even criticized Alexandria for admitting He into the Canon. And he feels, more than Clement, that not only the language, but the forms of thought are different from those of Paul's epp. This he tries to explain by the hypothesis that while the ideas were Paul's, they had been formulated and written down by some other disciple. He found traditions that named Luke and Clement of Rome, but who the actual writer was, Origen declares that "God alone knows."

The Pauline tradition persisted in Alexandria, and by the 4th cent. it was accepted without any of the qualifications made by Clement and Origen. It had also in the same period spread over the other eastern churches, both Gr and Syrian. But the Pauline tradition, where it is nearest the fountainhead of history, in Clement and Origen, only ascribes He to Paul in a secondary sense.

(2) In the West, the Pauline tradition failed to assert itself till the 4th cent., and was not generally accepted till the 5th cent. In Africa, another tradition prevailed, namely, that Barnabas was the author. This was the only other definite tradition of authorship that prevailed in antiquity. Tertullian, introducing a quotation of He 6 1.4–6, writes: "There is also an Ep. to the Hebrews under the name of Barnabas . . . . and the Ep. of Barnabas is more generally received among the churches than that apocryphal 'Shepherd' of adulterers" (De Pudicitia, 20). Tertullian is not expressing his mere personal opinion, but quoting a tradition which had so far established itself as to appear in the title of the epistle in the MS, and he betrays no consciousness of the existence of any other tradition. Zahn infers that this view prevailed in Montanist churches and may have originated in Asia. Moffatt thinks that it had also behind it "some Rom tradition" (Intro, 437). If it was originally, or at any time, the tradition of the African churches, it gave way there to the Alexandrian view in the course of the 4th cent. A Council of Hippo in 393 reckons "thirteen epp. of the apostle Paul, and one by the same to the Hebrews." A council of Carthage in 419 reckons "fourteen epp. of the apostle Paul." By such gradual stages did the Pauline tradition establish itself.

(3) All the evidence tends to show that in Rome and the remaining churches of the West, the epistle was originally anonymous. No tradition of authorship appears before the 4th cent. And Stephen Gobarus, writing in 600, says that both Irenaeus and Hippolytus denied the Pauline authorship. Photius repeats this statement as regards Hippolytus. Neither he nor Gobarus mentions any alternative view (Zahn, Intro, II, 310). The epistle was known in Rome (to Clement) toward the end of the 1st cent., and if Paul's name, or any other, had been associated with it from the beginning, it is impossible that it could have been forgotten by the time of Hippolytus. The western churches had no reason for refusing to admit He into the Pauline and canonical list of books, except only that they did not believe it to be the work of Paul, or of any other apostle.

It seems therefore certain that the epistle first became generally known as an anonymous writing. Even the Alexandrian tradition implies as much, for it appears first as an explanation by Pantaenus why Paul concealed his name. The idea that Paul was the author was therefore an Alexandrian inference. The religious value of the epistle was naturally first recognized in Alexandria, and the name of Paul, the chief letter-writer of the church, at once occurred to those in search for its author. Two facts account for the ultimate acceptance of that view by the whole church. The spiritual value and authority of the book were seen to be too great to relegate it into the same class as the Shepherd or the Ep. of Barnabas. And the conception of the Canon developed into the hard-and-fast rule of apostolicity. No writing could be admitted into the Canon unless it had an apostle for its author; and when He could no longer be excluded, it followed that its apostolic authorship must be affirmed. The tradition already existing in Alexandria supplied the demand, and who but Paul, among the apostles, could have written it?

The Pauline theory prevailed together with the scheme of thought that made it necessary, from the 5th to the 16th cent. The Humanists and the Reformers rejected it. But it was again revived in the 17th and 18th cents., along with the recrudescence of scholastic ideas. It is clear, however, that tradition and history shed no light upon the question of the authorship of He. They neither prove nor disprove the Pauline, or any other theory.

We are therefore thrown back, in our search for the author, on such evidence as the epistle itself affords, and that is wholly inferential.

2. The Witness of the Epistle Itself

It seems probable that the author was a Hellenist, a Gr-speaking Jew. He was familiar with the Scriptures of the OT and with the religious ideas and worship of the Jews. He claims the inheritance of their sacred history, traditions and institutions (1 1), and dwells on them with an intimate knowledge and enthusiasm that would be improbable, though not impossible, in a proselyte, and still more in a Christian convert from heathenism. But he knew the OT only in the LXX tr, which he follows even where it deviates from the Heb. He writes Gr with a purity of style and vocabulary to which the writings of Lk alone in the NT can be compared. His mind is imbued with that combination of Heb and Gr thought which is best known in the writings of Philo. His general typological mode of thinking, his use of the allegorical method, as well as the adoption of many terms that are most familiar in Alexandrian thought, all reveal the Hellenistic mind. Yet his fundamental conceptions are in full accord with the teaching of Paul and of the Johannine writings.

The central position assigned to Christ, the high estimate of His person, the saving significance of His death, the general trend of the ethical teaching, the writer's opposition to asceticism and his esteem for the rulers and teachers of the church, all bear out the inference that he belonged to a Christian circle dominated by Pauline ideas. The author and his readers alike were not personal disciples of Jesus, but had received the gospel from those who had heard the Lord (2 3) and who were no longer living (13 7). He had lived among his readers, and had probably been their teacher and leader; he is now separated from them but he hopes soon to return to them again (13 18 f).

Is it possible to give a name to this person?

(1) Although the Pauline tradition itself proves nothing, the internal evidence is conclusive against it. We know enough about Paul to be certain that he could not have written He, and that is all that can be said with confidence on the question of authorship. The style and language, the categories of thought and the method of argument, all differ widely from those of any writings ascribed to Paul. The latter quotes the OT from the Heb and LXX, but He only from LXX. Paul's formula of quotation is, "It is written" or "The scripture saith"; that of He, "God," or "The Holy Spirit," or "One somewhere saith." For Paul the OT is law, and stands in antithesis to the NT, but in He the OT is covenant, and is the "shadow" of the New Covenant. Paul's characteristic terms, "Christ Jesus," and "Our Lord Jesus Christ," are never found in He; and "Jesus Christ" only 3 t (10 10; 13 8), and "the Lord" (for Christ) only twice (2 3; 7 14)—phrases used by Paul over 600 t (Zahn). Paul's Christology turns around the death, resurrection and living presence of Christ in the church, that of He around His high-priestly function in heaven. Their conceptions of God differ accordingly. In He it is Judaistic-Platonistic, or (in later terminology) Deistic. The revelation of the Divine Fatherhood and the consequent immanence of God in history and in the world had not possessed the author's mind as it had Paul's. Since the present world is conceived in He as a world of "shadows," God could only intervene in it by mediators.

The experience and conception of salvation are also different in these two writers. There is no evidence in He of inward conflict and conversion and of constant personal relation with Christ, which constituted the entire spiritual life of Paul. The apostle's central doctrine, that of justification by faith, does not appear in He. Faith is less the personal, mystical relation with Christ, that it is for Paul, than a general hope which lays hold of the future to overcome the present; and salvation is accomplished by cleansing, sanctification and perfection, not by justification. While Paul's mind was not uninfluenced by Hellenistic thought, as we find it in Alexandria (as, e.g. in Col and Eph), it nowhere appears in his epp. so clearly and prominently as it does in He. Moreover, the author of He was probably a member of the community to which he writes (13 18 f), but Paul never stood in quite the relation supposed here to any church. Finally, Paul could not have written He 2 3, for he emphatically declares that he did not receive his gospel from the older disciples (Gal 1 12; 2 6).

The general Christian ideas on which He was in agreement with Paul were part of the heritage which the apostle had left to all the churches. The few more particular affinities of He with certain Pauline writings (e.g. He 2 2 ‖ Gal 3 19; He 12 22; 3 14 ‖ Gal 4 25; He 2 10 ‖ Rom 11 36; also with Eph; see von Soden, Hand-Commentar, 3) are easily explicable either as due to the author's reading of Paul's Epp. or as reminiscences of Pauline phrases that were current in the churches. But they are too few and slender to rest upon them any presumption against the arguments which disprove the Pauline tradition.

(2) The passage that is most conclusive against the Pauline authorship (2 3) is equally conclusive against any other apostle being the author. But almost every prominent name among the Christians of the second generation has been suggested. The epistle itself excludes Timothy (13 23), and Titus awaits his turn. Otherwise Luke, Clement of Rome, Barnabas, Silas, Apollos, Priscilla and Aquila, Philip the Deacon, and Aristion have all had their champions.

(a) The first two, Luke and Clement, were brought in through their connection with Paul. Where it was recognized that a direct Pauline authorship could not be maintained, the Pauline tradition might still be retained, if the epistle could be assigned to one of the apostle's disciples. These two were fixed upon as being well-known writers. But this very fact reveals the improbability of the theory. Similar arguments from language and thought to those derived from the comparison of He with the Pauline writings avail also in the comparison of He with the writings of Lk and Clement. Both these disciples of the apostle adhere much closer to his system of thought than He does, and they reveal none of the influences of Alexandrian thought, which is predominant in He.

(b) Of all the other persons suggested, so little is known that it is impossible to establish, with any convincing force, an argument for or against their authorship.

(α) Barnabas was a Levite of Cyprus (Acts 4 36), and once a companion of Paul (Acts 13 2 ff). Another ancient writing is called "the Epistle of Barnabas," but it has no affinity with He. The coincidence of the occurrence of the word "consolation" in Barnabas' name (Acts 4 36) and in the writer's description of He (13 22) is quite irrelevant. Tertullian's tradition is the only positive argument in favor of the Barnabas theory. It has been argued against it that Barnabas, being a Levite, could not have shown the opposition to the Levitical system, and the unfamiliarity with it (He 7 27; 9 4), which is supposed to mark our epistle. But the author's Levitical system was derived, not from the Heb OT, nor from the Jerus temple, but from Jewish tradition; and the supposed inaccuracies as to the daily sin offering (7 27), and the position of the golden altar of incense (9 4) have been traced to Jewish tradition (see Moffatt, Intro, 438). And the writer's hostility to the Levitical system is not nearly as intense as that of Paul to Pharisaism. There is nothing that renders it intrinsically impossible that Barnabas was the author, nor is anything known of him that makes it probable; and if he was, it is a mystery why the tradition was confined to Africa.

(β) Harnack has argued the probability of a joint authorship by Priscilla and Aquila. The interchange of "I" and "we" he explains as due to a dual authorship by persons intimately related, but such an interchange of the personal "I" and the epistolary "we" can be paralleled in the Epp. of Paul (e.g. Rom) where no question of joint authorship arises. The probable relation of the author to a church in Rome may suit Priscilla and Aquila (cf Rom 16 5 with He 13 22–24), but even if this interpretation of the aforementioned passages were correct, it is possible and probable that Luke, Barnabas, Apollos, and certainly Clement, stood in a similar relation to a Rom church. Harnack, on this theory, explains the disappearance of the author's name as due to prejudice against women teachers. This is the only novel point in favor of this theory as compared with several others; and it does not explain why Aquila's name should not have been retained with the address. The evidences adduced of a feminine mind behind the epistle are highly disputable. On the other hand, a female disciple of Paul's circle would scarcely assume such authority in the church as the author of He does (13 17 f; cf 1 Cor 14 34 f). And nothing that is known of Priscilla and Aquila would suggest the culture and the familiarity with Alexandrian thought possessed by this writer. Acts 18 26 does not prove that they were expert and cultured teachers, but only that they knew and could repeat the salient points of Paul's early preaching. So unusual a phenomenon as this theory supposes demands more evidence to make it even probable. (But see Rendel Harris, Sidelights on NT Research, 148–76.)

(γ) Philip the Deacon and Aristion, "a disciple of the Lord" mentioned by Papias, are little more than names to us. No positive knowledge of either survives on which any theory can be built. It is probable that both were personal disciples of the Lord, and they could not therefore have written He 2 3.

(δ) Apollos has found favor with many scholars from Luther downward. No ancient tradition supports this theory, a fact which tells heavily against it, but not conclusively, for someone must have written the letter, and his name was actually lost to early tradition, unless it were Barnabas, and that tradition too was unknown to the vast majority of the early churches. All that is known of Apollos suits the author of He. He may have learnt the gospel from "them that heard" (2 3); he was a Jew, "an Alexandrian by race, a learned [or eloquent] man," "mighty in the Scriptures," "he powerfully confuted the Jews" (Acts 18 24 ff), and he belonged to the same Pauline circle as Timothy and Titus (1 Cor 16 10–12; Tit 3 13; cf He 13 23). The Alexandrian type of thought, the affinities with Philo, the arguments from Jewish tradition and ceremonial, the fluent style, may all have issued from "an eloquent Jew of Alexandria." But it does not follow that Apollos was the only person of this type. The author may have been a Gentile, as the purity of his Gr language and style suggests; and the combination of Gr and Heb thought, which the epistle reflects, and even Philo's terms, may have had a wide currency outside Alexandria, as for instance in the great cosmopolitan cities of Asia. All that can be said is that the author of He was someone generally like what is known of Apollos, but who he actually was, we must confess with Origen, "God alone knows."

IV. Destination.—The identity of the first readers of He is, if possible, more obscure than that of the author. It was written to Christians, and to a specific body or group of Christians (see I above). The title "to Hebrews" might mean properly Palestinian Jews who spoke the Heb language, but the fact that the epistle was written in Gr excludes that supposition. It therefore meant Christians of Jewish origin, and gives no indication of their place of residence. The title represents an early inference drawn from the contents of the document, and the tradition it embodies was unanimously accepted from the 2d cent. down to the early part of the last cent. Now, however, a considerable body of critics hold that the original readers were Gentiles. The question is entirely one of inference from the contents of the epistle itself.

1. General Character of the Readers

The readers, like the writer, received the gospel first from "them that heard" (2 3), from the personal disciples of the Lord, but they were not of their number. They had witnessed "signs and wonders" and "manifold powers" and "gifts of the Holy Spirit" (2 4). Their conversion had been thorough, and their faith and Christian life had been of a high order. They had a sound knowledge of the first principles of Christ (6 1 ff). They had become "partakers of Christ," and had need only to "hold fast the beginning of [their] confidence firm unto the end" (3 14). They had been fruitful in good works, ministering unto the saints (6 10), enduring suffering and persecution, and sympathizing with whose who were imprisoned (10 32–34). All this had been in former days which appeared now remote. Their rulers and ministers of those days are now dead (13 7). And they themselves have undergone a great change. While they should have been teachers, they have become dull of hearing, and have need again to be taught the rudiments of the first principles of the gospel (5 12), and they are in danger of a great apostasy from the faith. They need warning against "an evil heart of unbelief, in falling away from the living God" (3 12). They are become sluggish (6 12), profane like Esau (12 16), worldly-minded (13 5). Perhaps their religion was tending toward a false asceticism and outward works (13 4.9). And now that this moral dulness and spiritual indifference had fallen upon them, they are being subjected to a new test by persecution from outside (10 36; 12 4), which renders the danger of their falling away from the faith all the more imminent. The author apparently bases his claim to warn them on the fact that he had been a teacher among them, and hoped soon to return to them (13 18 f). The same might be said perhaps of Timothy (13 23). Both author and readers had friends in Italy (13 24) who were with the author when he wrote, either in Italy saluting the readers outside, or outside, saluting the readers in Italy. In all this there is little or nothing to help to fix the destination of the letter, for it might be true at some time or other of any church.

2. Jews or Gentiles?

The old tradition that the readers were Jews claims some more definite support from the epistle itself. The writer assumes an intimate knowledge of the OT and of Jewish ceremonial on their part. The fathers of the Heb race are also their fathers (1 1; 3 9). The humanity that Christ assumed and redeemed is called "the seed of Abraham" (2 16). All this, however, might stand in reference to a gentile church, for the early Christians, without distinction of race, regarded themselves as the true Israel and heirs of the Heb revelation, and of all that related to it (1 Cor 10 1; Gal 3 7 ff; 4 21 ff; Rom 4 11–18). Still there is force in Zahn's argument that "Hebrews does not contain a single sentence in which it is so much as intimated that the readers became members of God's people who descended from Abraham, and heirs of the promise given to them and their forefathers, and how they became such" (Intro to NT, II, 323). Zahn further finds a direct proof in 13 13 that "both the readers and the author belong to the Jewish people," which he interprets as "meaning that the readers were to renounce fellowship with the Jewish people who had rejected Jesus, to confess the crucified Jesus, and to take upon themselves all the ignominy that Jesus met at the hands of his countrymen" (ib, 324–25). But that is too large an inference to draw from a figurative expression which need not, and probably does not, mean more than an exhortation to rely on the sacrifice of Christ, rather than upon any external rules and ceremonies. Nor were the "divers and strange teachings" about marriage and meats (13 4.9) necessarily Jewish doctrines. They might be the doctrines of an incipient Gnosticism which spread widely throughout the Christian churches, both Jewish and gentile, toward the end of the 1st cent. There is otherwise no evidence that the apostasy, of which the readers stood in danger, was into Judaism, but it was rather a general unbelief and "falling away from the living God" (3 12).

It is the whole argument of the epistle, rather than any special references, that produced the tradition, and supports the view, that the readers were Jews. The entire message of the epistle, the dominant claims of Christ and of the Christian faith, rests upon the supposition that the readers held Moses, Aaron, the Jewish priesthood, the old Covenant and the Levitical ritual, in the highest esteem. The author's argument is: You will grant the Divine authority and greatness of Moses, Aaron and the Jewish institutions: Christ is greater than they; therefore you ought to be faithful to Him. He assumes an exclusively Jewish point of view in the minds of his readers as his major premise. He could scarcely do that, if they had been Gentiles. Paul, when writing to the mixed church at Rome, relates his philosophy of the Christian revelation to both Jewish and gentile pre-Christian revelation. Gentile Christians adopted the Jewish tradition as their own in consequence of, and secondary to, their attachment to Christianity. Even Judaizing gentile Christians, such as may be supposed to have belonged to the Galatian and Corinthian churches, adopted some parts of the Jewish law only as a supplement to Christianity, but not as its basis.

Von Soden and others have argued with much reason that these Christians were not in danger of falling back into Judaism from Christianity, but rather of falling away from all faith into unbelief and materialism, like the Israelites in the wilderness (3 7 ff), or Esau (12 16). With all its references to OT sacrifice and ceremonial, the letter contains not a single warning against reviving them, nor any indications that the readers were in danger of so doing (Hand-Commentar, 12–16). But it has been too readily assumed that these facts prove that the readers were not Jews. The pressure of social influence and persecution rendered Jews and Jewish Christians, as well as gentile Christians, liable to apostatize to heathenism or irreligion (Wisd 2 10.20; 2 Macc 4, 6, 7; Philo, De Migratione Abrahami, XVI; Mt 24 10.12; Acts 20 30; 1 Cor 10 7.14; 2 Thess 2 4; 1 Jn 2 18; 5 21; Pliny Ep. X, 96). Von Soden's argument really cuts the other way. If the writer had been dealing with gentile Christians who were in danger of relapsing into heathenism or of falling into religious indifference, his argument from the shadowy and temporary glories of Judaism to the perfect salvation in Christ would avail nothing, because, for such, his premises would depend upon his conclusion. But if they were Jewish Christians, even though leaning toward heathenism, his argument is well calculated to call up on its side all the dormant force of their early religious training. He is not arguing them out of a "subtle Judaism" quickened by the zeal of a propaganda (Moffatt, Intro, 449–50), but from "drifting away" (2 1), from "neglect" (2 3), from "an evil heart of unbelief, in falling away from the living God" (3 12), from "disobedience" (4 11), from "a dulness of hearing" (5 11), but into "diligence . . . . that ye be not sluggish" (6 11 f), into "boldness and patience" (10 35 f), and to "lift up the hands that hang down, and the palsied knees" (12 12); and this he might well do by his appeal to their whole religious experience, both Jewish and Christian, and to the whole religious history of their race.

3. The Locality of the Readers

The question of the locality of these "Hebrews" remains a matter for mere conjecture. Jerus, Alexandria, Rome, Antioch, Colossae, Ephesus, Berea, Ravenna and other places have been suggested. Tradition, since Clement of Alexandria, fixed on Jerus, but on the untenable ground that the letter was written to Aram.-speaking Jews. The undisputed fact that it was written in Gr tells against Jerus. So does the absence of all reference to the temple ritual, and the mention of almsgiving as the chief grace of the "Hebrews" (6 10). Jerus received rather than gave alms. Nor is it likely that all the personal disciples of the Lord would have died out in Jerus (2 3). And it could not be charged against the mother church that it had produced no teachers (5 12). These points also tell with almost equal force against any Palestinian locality.

Alexandria was suggested as an alternative to Jerus, on the supposition that those references to Jewish ritual which did not correspond with the Jerus ritual (7 27; 9 4; 10 11) might refer to the temple at Leontopolis. But the ritual system of the epistle is that of the tabernacle and of tradition, and not of any temple. The Alexandrian character of the letter has bearing on the identity of the author, but not so much on that of his readers. The erroneous idea that Paul was the author arose in Alexandria, but it would have been least likely to arise where the letter was originally sent.

Rome has lately found much favor. We first learn of the existence of the letter at Rome. The phrase "they of Italy salute you" (13 24) implies that either the writer or his readers were in Italy. It may be more natural to think of the writer, with a small group of Italian friends away from home, sending greetings to Italy, than to suppose that a greeting from Italy generally was sent to a church at a distance. It is probable that a body of Jewish Christians existed in Rome, as in other large cities of the Empire. But this view does not, as von Soden thinks, explain any coincidences between He and Rom. A Rom origin might. It could explain the use of He by Clement. But the letter might also have come to Rome by Clement's time, even though it was originally sent elsewhere. The slender arguments in favor of Rome find favor chiefly because no arguments can be adduced in favor of any other place.

1. Terminal Dates

V. Date.—The latest date for the composition of He is clearly fixed as earlier than 96 AD by reason of its use by Clement of Rome about that time. There is no justification for the view that He shows dependence on Jos. The earliest date cannot be so definitely fixed. The apparent dependence of He on Paul's Epp., Gal, 1 Cor and Rom, brings it beyond 50 AD.

2. Conversion and History of Readers

But we have data in the epistle itself which require a date considerably later. The readers had been converted by personal disciples of the Lord (2 3). They did not, therefore, belong to the earliest group of Christians. But it is not necessary to suppose a long interval between the Lord's ascension and their conversion. The disciples were scattered widely from Jerus by the persecution that followed the death of Stephen (Acts 8 1). "We may well believe that the vigorous preaching of St. Stephen would set a wave in motion which would be felt even at Rome" (Sanday, Romans, xxviii). They are not, therefore, necessarily to be described as Christians of the 2d generation in the strict chronological sense. But the letter was written a considerable time after their conversion. They have had time for great development (5 12). They have forgotten the former days after their conversion (10 32). Their early leaders are now dead (13 7). Yet the majority of the church still consists of the first converts (2 3; 10 32). And although no argument can be based upon the mention of 40 years (3 9), for it is only an incidental phrase in a quotation, yet no longer interval could lie between the founding of the church and the writing of the letter. It might be shorter. And the church may have been founded at any time from 32 to 70 AD.

3. Doctrinal Development

The doctrinal development represented in He stands midway between the system of the later Pauline Epp. (Phil, Col, Eph) and that of the Johannine writings. The divers and strange teachings mentioned include only such ascetic tendencies about meat and marriage (13 4.9) as are reflected in Paul's Epp. early and late. There is no sign of the appearance of the full-blown heresies of the Ebionites, Docetists, and Gnostics, which became prevalent before the end of the 1st cent. On the other hand the Logos-doctrine as the interpretation of the person of Christ (1 1–4) is more fully thought out than in Paul, but less explicit, and less assimilated with the purpose of Christianity, than in the Fourth Gospel.

4. The Fall of Jerusalem

It has been argued that the letter must have been written before the fall of Jerus in 70 AD, because in writing to a Jewish community, and esp. in dealing with Jewish ritual, the writer would have referred to that event, if it had happened. This point would be relevant, if the letter had been addressed to Jerus, which is highly improbable. But, at a distance, an author so utterly unconcerned with contemporary history could easily have omitted mention of even so important a fact. For in fact the author never mentions the temple or its ritual. His system is that of the tabernacle of the OT and of Jewish tradition. The writer's interest is not in historical Judaism, and his omission to mention the great catastrophe does not prove that it had not occurred. The use of the present tense of the ritual does not imply its present continuance. "The present expresses the fact that so it is enjoined in the law, the past that with the founding of the New Covenant the old had been abolished" (Peake, Hebrews, 39).

5. Timothy

A point of contact with contemporary history is found in the fact that Timothy was still living and active when He was written (13 23), but it does not carry us far. Timothy was a young man and already a disciple, when Paul visited Galatia on his 2d journey about 46 AD (Acts 16 1). And he may have lived to the end of the century or near to it. It cannot be safely argued from the mere mention of his name alone, that Paul and his other companions were dead.

6. Two Persecutions

Two incidents in the history of the readers are mentioned which afford further ground for a somewhat late date. Immediately after their conversion, they suffered persecution, "a great conflict of sufferings; partly, being made a gazingstock both by reproaches and afflictions; and partly, becoming partakers with them that were so used" (He 10 32 f). And now again, when the letter is written, they are entering upon another time of similar trial, in which they "have need of patience" (10 36), though they "have not yet resisted unto blood" (12 4). Their leaders, at least, it would appear, the writer and Timothy, have also been in prison, but one is at liberty and the other expects to be soon (13 19.23). It has been conjectured that the first persecution was that under Nero in 64 AD, and the second, that in the reign of Domitian, after 81 AD. But when it is remembered that in some part of the Empire Christians were almost always under persecution, and that the locale of these readers is very uncertain, these last criteria do not justify any dogmatizing. It is certain that the letter was written in the second half of the 1st cent. Certain general impressions, the probability that the first apostles and leaders of the church were dead, the absence of any mention of Paul, the development of Paul's theological ideas in a new medium, the disappearance of the early enthusiasm, the many and great changes that had come over the community, point strongly to the last quarter of the century. The opinions of scholars at present seem to converge about the year 80 AD or a little later.

    (5) Greetings (13 24).
    (6) Grace (13 25).

2. The Main Theme

The theme of the epistle is the absoluteness of the Christian religion, as based upon the preëminence of Jesus Christ, the one and only mediator of salvation. The essence of Christ's preëminence is that He fully realizes in His own person the principles of revelation and reconciliation. It is made manifest in His superiority over the Jewish system of salvation, which He therefore at once supersedes and fulfils. The author's working concept is the Logos-doctrine of Philo; and the empirical data to which it is related is the religious history of Israel, as it culminates in Christianity. He makes no attempt to prove either his ideal first principles or his historical premises, and his philosophy of religion takes no account of the heathen world. The inner method of his argument is to fit Judaism and Christianity into the Logos-concept; but his actual is related to the ideal in the way of Plato's antithesis, of shadow and reality, of pattern and original, rather than in Aristotle's way of development, although the influence of the latter method may often be traced, as in the history of faith, which is carried back to the beginnings of history, but is made perfect only in the Christian consummation (11 40). In a number of other ideas the teleological movement may be seen cutting across the categories of shadow and reality (1 3; 1 10; 4 8 f; 5 8 f; 9 12; 10 12; 12 22).

3. Alexandrian Influences

The form of the argument may be described as either rabbinical or Alexandrian. The writer, after laying down his proposition, proceeds to prove it by quotations from the OT, taken out of their context and historical connection, adapted and even changed to suit his present purpose. This practice was common to Palestinian and Alexandrian writers; as was also the use of allegory, which plays a large part in He (e.g. 3 7—4 11; 13 11 f). But the writer's allegorical method differs from that of the rabbis in that it is like Philo's, part of a conscious philosophy, according to which the whole of the past and present history of the world is only a shadow of the true realities which are laid up in heaven (8 5; 9 23 f; 10 1). His interest in historical facts, in OT writers, in Jewish institutions and even in the historical life of Jesus, is quite subordinate to his prepossession with the eternal and heavenly realities which they, in more or less shadowy fashion, represent. That the affinities of He are Alexandrian rather than Palestinian is further proved by many philological and literary correspondences with Wisd and Philo. Most of the characteristic terms and phrases of the epistle are also found in these earlier writers. It has been argued that He and Wisd came from the same hand, and it seems certain that the author of He was familiar with both Wisd and the writings of Philo (Plumptre in Expos, I, 329 ff, 409 ff; von Soden in Hand-Commentar, 5–6). In Philo the dualism of appearance and reality finds its ultimate synthesis in his master-conception of the Logos, and although this term does not appear in He in Philo's sense, the doctrine is set forth in Philonic phraseology in the opening verses (1 1–4). As Logos, Christ excels the prophets as revealer of God, is superior to the angels who were the mediators of the old Covenant, and is more glorious than Moses as the builder of God's true tabernacle, His eternal house; He is a greater Saviour than Joshua, for He brings his own to final rest; and He supersedes the Aaronic priesthood, for while they ministered in a "holy place made with hands, like in pattern to the true," under a "law having a shadow of the good things to come, not the very image of the things" (9 24; 10 1), He "having come a high priest of the good things to come, through the greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands . . . . nor yet through the blood of goats and calves, but through his own blood, entered in once for all into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption" (9 11 f).

4. The Christian Factor

Yet it is possible to exaggerate the dependence of He on Alexandrian thought. Deeper than the allegorical interpretation of passages culled from the LXX, deeper than the Logos-philosophy which formed the framework of his thought, is the writer's experience and idea of the personal Christ. His central interest lies, not in the theoretical scheme which he adopts, but in the living person who, while He is the eternal reality behind all shadows, and the very image of God's essence, is also our brother who lived and suffered on earth, the author of our salvation, our "forerunner within the veil," who "is able to save to the uttermost them that draw near unto God through him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them" (1 1–4; 2 14 ff; 2 10; 5 7–9; 4 14–15; 6 20; 7 25). As in Paul and Jn, so in He, the historical and ever-living Christ comes in as an original and creative element, which transforms the abstract philosophy of Hellenistic thought into a living system of salvation. Because of His essential and personal preëminence over the institutions and personalities of the old Covenant, Christ has founded a new Covenant, given a new revelation and proclaimed a new gospel. The writer never loses sight of the present bearing of these eternal realities on the lives of his readers. They are for their warning against apostasy, for their encouragement in the face of persecution, and for their undying hope while they 'run the race that is set before [them], looking unto Jesus the author and perfecter of . . . . faith' (2 3; 3 12 ff; 4 1 ff; 10 28 ff; 12 1 f.22 ff).

LITERATURE

"The Gospel according to the Hebrews" was a work of early Christian literature to which reference is frequently made by the church Fathers in the first five centuries, and of which some twenty or more fragments, preserved in their writings, have come down to us. The book itself has long disappeared. It has, however, been the subject of many critical surmises and discussions in the course of the last century. It has been regarded as the original record of the life of Jesus, the Archimedes-point of the whole gospel history. From it Justin Martyr has been represented as deriving his knowledge of the works and words of Christ, and to it have been referred the gospel quotations found in Justin and other early writers when these deviate in any measure from the text of the canonical gospels. Recent discussions have thrown considerable light upon the problems connected with this Gospel, and a large literature has grown up around it of which the most important works will be noted below.

1. References in Early Church History

Speaking of Papias Eusebius mentions that he has related the story of a woman who was accused of many sins before the Lord, which is contained in the "Gospel according to the Hebrews." This does not prove that Papias was acquainted with this Gospel, for he might have obtained the story, which cannot any longer be regarded as part of St. John's Gospel, from oral tradition. But there is a certain significance in Eusebius' mentioning it in this connection (Euseb., HE, III, xxxix, 16). Eusebius, speaking of Ignatius and his epp., takes notice of a saying of Jesus which he quotes (Ep. ad Smyrn, iii; cf Lk 24 39), "Take, handle me, and see that I am not an incorporeal spirit." The saying differs materially from the saying in St. Luke's Gospel, and Eusebius says he has no knowledge whence it had been taken by Ignatius. Jerome, however, twice over attributes the saying to the "Gospel according to the Hebrews," and Origen quotes it from the "Teaching of Peter." Ignatius may have got the saying from oral tradition, and we cannot, therefore, be sure that he knew this Gospel.

The first early Christian writer who is mentioned as having actually used the "Gospel according to the Hebrews" is Hegesippus, who flourished in the second half of the 2d cent. Eusebius, to whom we owe the reference, tells us that Hegesippus in his Memoirs quotes passages from "the Syriac Gospel according to the Hebrews" (HE, IV, xxii, 7).

Irenaeus, in the last quarter of the 2d cent., says the Ebionites use only the "Gospel according to Matthew" and reject the apostle Paul, calling him an apostate from the law (Adv. Haer., i. 26, 2). There is reason to believe that there is some confusion in this statement of Irenaeus, for we have the testimony of Eusebius, Jerome and Epiphanius that it was the "Gospel according to the Hebrews" that was used by the Ebionites. With this qualification we may accept Irenaeus as a witness to this Gospel.

Clement of Alexandria early in the 3d cent. quotes from it an apocryphal saying with the same formula as he employs for quotation of Holy Scripture (Strom., ii.9). Origen, Clement's successor at Alexandria, has one very striking quotation from the "Gospel according to the Hebrews" (Comm. in Joann, ii), and Jerome says this Gospel is often used by Origen.

Eusebius, in the first half of the 4th cent., mentions that the Ebionites use only the "Gospel according to the Hebrews" and take small account of the others (HE, III, xxvii, 4). He has, besides, other references to it, and in his widely known classification of Christian Scriptures into "acknowledged" "disputed," and "rejected," he mentions this Gospel which he says some have placed in the last category, although those of the Hebrews who have accepted Christ are delighted with it (HE, III, xxv, 5). Eusebius had himself in all probability seen and handled the book in the library of his friend Pamphilus at Caesarea, where Jerome, half a century later, found it and tr^{d} it.

Epiphanius, who lived largely in Pal, and wrote his treatise on heresies in the latter half of the 4th cent., has much to say of the Ebionites, and the Nazarenes. Speaking of the Ebionites, he says they receive the "Gospel according to Matthew" to the exclusion of the others, mentioning that it alone of the NT books is in Heb speech and Heb characters, and is called the "Gospel according to the Hebrews" (Haer., xxx.3). He goes on to say, that their "Gospel according to Matthew," as it is named, is not complete but falsified and mutilated, "and they call it the Heb Gospel" (Haer., xxx.13). The quotations which Epiphanius proceeds to make show that this Gospel diverges considerably from the canonical Gospel of Mt and may well be that according to the Hebrews. It is more likely that "the Gospel according to Matthew, very full, in Hebrew," of which Epiphanius speaks, when telling about the Nazarene, is the Heb "Gospel of Matthew" attested by Papias, Irenaeus, and a widespread early tradition. But as Epiphanius confesses he does not know whether it has the genealogies, it is clear he was not himself acquainted with the book.

Jerome, toward the end of the 4th cent., is our chief authority for the circulation and use of the "Gospel according to the Hebrews," although his later statements on the subject do not always agree with the earlier. He was proud of being "trilinguis," acquainted with Heb as well as with Lat and Gr. "There is a Gospel," he says, "which the Nazarenes and Ebionites use, which I lately tr^{d} from the Heb tongue into Gr and which is called by many the authentic Gospel of Matthew" (Comm. on Mt 12 13). The fact here mentioned, that he tr^{d} the work, seems to imply that this Gospel was really something different from the canonical Mt which he had in his hands. In another place, however, he writes: "Matthew . . . . first of all composed the Gospel of Christ in Heb letters and words, in Judaea, for behoof of those of the circumcision who had believed, and it is not quite certain who afterward tr^{d} it into Gr. But the very Heb is preserved to this day in the Caesarean library, which Pamphilus the Martyr, with such care, collected. I myself was allowed the opportunity of copying it by the Nazarenes in Berea who use this volume. In which it is to be observed that the evangelist, when he uses the testimonies of the OT, either in his own person, or in that of the Lord and Saviour, does not follow the authority of the LXX translators, but the Heb. Of those, the following are two examples: 'Out of Egypt have I called my Son' (Mt 2 15 AV); and 'He shall be called a Nazarene' (Mt 2 23)" (De Vir. Ill., iii). It certainly looks as if in the former instance Jerome meant the Gospel according to the Hebrews, and in the latter the well-authenticated Heb Gospel of St. Matthew. At a later time, however, Jerome appears to withdraw this and to introduce a confusing or even contradictory note. His words are: "In the Gospel according to the Hebrews, which was written indeed in the Chaldee-Syr (Aram.) language, but in Heb characters, which the Nazarenes use as the 'Gospel of the Apostles,' or as most people think 'according to Matthew,' which also is contained in the library at Caesarea, the narrative says" (Adv. Pelag., iii.2). As he proceeds, he quotes passages which are not in the canonical Mt. He also says: "That Gospel which is called the Gospel of the Hebrews which was latedly tr^{d} by me into Gr and Lat, and was used frequently by Origen" (Catal. Script. Eccl., "Jacobus"). Jerome's notices of the actual Gospel were frequent, detailed and unequivocal.

Nicephorus at the beginning of the 9th cent. puts the Gospel according to the Hebrews in his list of disputed books of the NT along with the Apocalypse of St. John, the Apocalypse of Peter, and the Ep. of Barnabas. This list is believed to rest upon an authority of about the year 500 AD, and, in the stichometry attached, this Gospel is estimated to have occupied 2,200 lines, while the canonical Mt occupied 2,500.

Codex Λ of the 9th cent., discovered by Tischendorf, and now in the Bodleian Library at Oxford, has marginal notes affixed to four passages of Mt giving the readings of to Ioudaïkon, the lost Gospel according to the Hebrews (Scrivener, Textual Criticism, I^{4}, 160; see also Plate XI, 30, p. 131).

2. Its Character and Contents

All that survives, and all that we are told, of this work, show that it was of the nature of a Gospel, and that it was written in the manner of the Synoptic Gospels. But it seems not to have acquired at any time ecclesiastical standing outside the very limited circles of Jewish Christians who preferred it. And it never attained canonical authority. The Muratorian Fragment has no reference to it. Irenaeus knew that the Ebionites used only the Gospel according to Matthew in Heb, although, as we have seen, this may be really the Gospel according to the Hebrews; but his fourfold Gospel comprises the Gospels of Mt, Mk, Lk and Jn, which we know. There is no reason to believe that it was the source of the quotations made by Justin from the Apomnemoneumata, or of quotations made anonymously by others of the early Fathers. Like the Synoptic Gospels, however, it contained narratives of events as well as sayings and discourses. It had an account of John the Baptist's ministry, of the baptism of Jesus, of the call of the apostles, of the woman taken in adultery, of the Last Supper, of the denial of Peter, of appearances of Jesus after the resurrection; and it contained the Lord's Prayer, and sayings of Jesus, like the forgiveness of injuries seventy times seven, the counsel to the rich young ruler, and others. One or two sayings have a gnostic tinge, as when Jesus calls the Holy Spirit His mother, and is made to express His unwillingness to eat the flesh of the Passover Lamb. There are apocryphal additions, even where incidents and sayings are narrated belonging to the canonical Gospels, and there are sayings and incidents wholly apocryphal in the fragments of the Gospel which have survived. But these superfluities do not imply any serious deviation from Catholic doctrine; they only prove, as Professor Zahn says, "the earnestness of the redactor of the Gospel according to the Hebrews to enrich the only Gospel which Jewish Christians possessed up to that time from the still unexhausted source of private oral tradition" (GK, II, 717).

The very title of the work suggests that it circulated among Jewish Christians. Those Christians of Pal to whom Jerus was the ecclesiastical center betook themselves, after the troubles which befell the Holy City, to the less frequented regions beyond the Jordan, and were thus cut off from the main stream of catholic Christianity. It was accordingly easier for the spirit of exclusiveness to assert itself among them and also for heretical tendencies to develop. The Ebionites went farthest in this direction. They denied the supernatural birth of Our Lord, and insisted upon the binding character of the Law for all Christians. The Nazarenes, as all Jewish Christians were called at first, observed the ceremonial law themselves, but did not impose it upon gentile Christians. And they accepted the catholic doctrine of the person of Christ. It was among a community of these Nazarenes at Berea, the modern Aleppo, that Jerome, during a temporary residence at Chalcis in Northern Syria, found the Gospel according to the Hebrews in circulation. No fewer than 9 t does he mention that this Gospel is their one Gospel, and only once does he connect the Ebionites with them in the use of it. Epiphanius draws a clear line of distinction between the Ebionites and the Nazarenes; and we can scarcely suppose that a Gospel which satisfied the one would be wholly acceptable to the other. There is reason to believe that the Heb Gospel of St. Matthew was most to the mind of the Heb Christians, and that it took different forms in the hands of the sects into which the Jewish Christian church became divided. Thus the Gospel of the Nazarenes was the Gospel according to the Hebrews, which in all probability had some affinity with the Heb Gospel of St. Matthew. The Gospel of the Ebionites, which seems to have been the same as the Gospel of the Twelve Apostles, was something of a more divergent doctrinal tendency suited to the exclusive and heretical views of that sect. But it is not easy to reconcile the statements of Epiphanius with those of Eusebius and Jerome.

That the Heb tongue in which Papias says St. Matthew composed his Logia was the Aram. of Pal is generally accepted. This Aram. was closely akin to the Syr spoken between the Mediterranean and the Tigris. It was the same as the Chaldee of the books of Ezr, Neh, and Dnl, of which examples have so recently been found in the Aram. papyri from Elephantine at Assouan. Eusebius and Jerome are emphatic and precise in recording the fact that the Gospel according to the Hebrews was not only Heb or Aram. in composition, but written in the square Heb characters, so different from the Old Heb of the Moabite Stone and the Siloam inscription. That there was a Gr tr before the time of Jerome of the Gospel according to the Hebrews, which was used by Origen, Clement of Alexandria, and others, is strenuously affirmed by Professor Harnack (Altchristliche Literatur, I, 6 ff) and as strenuously denied by Professor Zahn (GK, II, 648 ff). One reason why the book never attained to any ecclesiastical authority was no doubt its limited circulation in a tongue familiar, outside the circle of Jewish Christians, to only a learned few. For this reason also it is unlikely that it will ever be found, as the Epistle of Barnabas, the Shepherd, and other works have been.

4. Relation to St. Matthew

It is natural to seek for traces of special relationship between the Gospel according to the Hebrews, circulating among communities of Jewish Christians, and the Gospel according to St. Matthew which grew up on the soil of Pal, and which was originally composed in the interest of Jewish Christians, and circulated at a very early period in a Heb recension, soon superseded by the canonical Gospel of Mt and now altogether lost. We have already seen that Irenaeus in all likelihood confused the "Gospel according to the Hebrews" with the Heb Gospel of St. Matthew; and that Jerome says the Gospel used by the Nazarenes was called by many the authentic Gospel of St. Matthew. Moreover, among the fragments that have survived, there are more which resemble St. Matthew's record than either of the other Synoptics. E. B. Nicholson, after a full and scholarly examination of the fragments and of the references, puts forward the hypothesis that "St. Matthew wrote at different times the canonical Gospel and the Gospel according to the Hebrews, or, at least, that large part of the latter which runs ‖ to the former" (The Gospel according to the Hebrews, 104). The possibility of two editions of the same Gospel-writing coming from the same hand has recently received illustration from Professor Blass's theory of two recensions of the Acts and of St. Luke's Gospel to explain the textual peculiarities of these books in Codex D. This theory has received the adhesion of eminent scholars, but Nicholson has more serious differences to explain, and it cannot be said that his able argument and admirably marshaled learning have carried conviction to the minds of NT scholars.

5. Time of Composition

If we could be sure that Ignatius in his Ep. to the Smyrneans derived the striking saying attributed to Our Lord, "Take, handle me, and see that I am not an incorporeal spirit," from the Gospel according to the Hebrews, we should be able to fix its composition as at any rate within the 1st cent. The obscurity of its origin, the primitive cast of its contents, and the respect accorded to it down into the 5th cent., have disposed some scholars to assign it an origin not later than our Synoptic Gospels, and to regard it as continuing the Aram. tradition of the earliest preaching and teaching regarding Christ. The manifestly secondary character of some of its contents seems to be against such an early origin. Professor Zahn is rather disposed to place it not earlier than 130, when, during the insurrection of Bar-cochba, the gulf that had grown up between Jews and Jewish Christians was greatly deepened, and with an exclusively gentile church in Jerus, the Jewish Christians had lost their center and broken off into sects. The whole situation seems to him to point to a date somewhere between 130–50 AD. The data for any precise determination of the question are wanting.

6. Uncanonical Sayings and Incidents

There is a saying which Clement of Alexandria quotes from it as Scripture: "He that wonders shall reign and he that reigns shall rest" (Strom., ii.9). Origen quotes from it a saying of Jesus, reminding us somewhat of Ezk (8 3): "Just now My Mother the Holy Spirit took me by one of my hairs, and bore me away to the great mountain Thabor" (Orig., In Joann., ii; it is quoted several times both by Origen and Jerome). Jerome more than once quotes from it a saying of the Lord to His disciples: "Never be joyful except when ye look on your brother in love" (Hieron. in Eph 5 4; in Ezk 18 7). In his comm. on Mt (6 11) Jerome mentions that he found in the third petition of the Lord's prayer for the difficult and unique Gr word ἐπιούσιος, epioúsios, which he tr^{s} supersubstantialis, the Aram. word māḥār, crastinus, so that the sense would be, "Tomorrow's bread give us today." Of unrecorded incidents the most notable is that of the appearance of the Risen Lord to James: "And when the Lord had given His linen cloth to the servant of the priest, He went to James and appeared to him. For James had sworn that he would not eat bread from that hour wherein he had drunk the cup of the Lord until he saw Him rising from the dead. Again a little afterward the Lord says, Bring a table and bread. Immediately it is added: He took bread and blessed and brake, and afterward gave it to James the Just and said to him, My brother, eat thy bread for the Son of Man has risen from them that sleep" (Hieron., De Vir. Illustr., "Jacobus").

Jerome also tells that in the Gospel according to the Hebrews, there is the following passage: "Lo the mother of the Lord and His brethren said unto Him: John the Baptist is baptizing for the remission of sins; let us go and be baptized by him. But He said to them: What sin have I committed that I should go and be baptized by him? Unless perchance this very word which I have spoken is a sin of ignorance" (Hieron., Adv. Pelag., iii.2).

7. Conclusion This Gospel is not to be classed with heretical Gospels like that of Marcion, nor with apocryphal Gospels like that of James or Nicodemus. It differed from the former in that it did not deviate from any essential of catholic truth in its representation of Our Lord. It differed from the latter in that it narrated particulars mostly relating to Our Lord's public ministry, while they occupy themselves with matters of curiosity left unrecorded in the canonical Gospels. It differs from the canonical Gospels only in that it is more florid in style, more diffuse in the relation of incidents, and more inclined to sectional views of doctrine. Its uncanonical sayings and incidents may have come from oral tradition, and they do lend a certain interest and picturesqueness to the narrative. Its language confined it to a very limited sphere, and its sectional character prevented it from ever professing Scriptural authority or attaining to canonical rank. See also Apocryphal Gospels.

HEBRON, hē′brun (חֶבְרוֹן, ḥebhrōn, "league" or "confederacy"; Χεβρών, Chebrōn): One of the most ancient and important cities in Southern Pal, now known to the Moslems as el Khalîl (i.e. Khalîl er Rahmān, "the friend of the Merciful," i.e. of God, a favorite name for Abraham; cf Jas 2 23). The city is some 20 miles S. of Jerus, situated in an open valley, 3,040 ft. above sea-level.

I. History of the City.—Hebron is said to have been founded before Zoan (i.e. Tanis) in Egypt (Nu 13 22); its ancient name was Kiriath-arba, probably meaning the "Four Cities," perhaps because divided at one time into four quarters, but according to Jewish writers so called because four patriarchs, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob and Adam were buried there. According to Josh 15 13 it was so called after Arba, the father of Anak.

1. Patriarchal Period Abram came and dwelt by the oaks of Mamre (q.v.), "which are in Hebron" (Gen 13 18); from here he went to the rescue of Lot and brought him back after the defeat of Chedorlaomer (14 13 f); here his name was changed to Abraham (17 5); to this place came the three angels with the promise of a son (18 1 f); Sarah died here (23 2), and for her sepulcher Abraham bought the cave of Machpelah (23 17); here Isaac and Jacob spent much of their lives (35 27; 37 14); from here Jacob sent Joseph to seek his brethren (37 14), and hence Jacob and his sons went down to Egypt (46 1). In the cave of Machpelah all the patriarchs and their wives, except Rachel, were buried (49 30 f; 50 13).

2. Times of Joshua and Judges The spies visited Hebron and near there cut the cluster of grapes (Nu 13 22 f). Hoham (q.v.), king of Hebron, was one of the five kings defeated by Joshua at Beth-horon and slain at Makkedah (Josh 10 3 f). Caleb drove out from Hebron the "three sons of Anak" (14 12; 15 14); it became one of the cities of Judah (15 54), but was set apart for the Kohathite Levites (21 10 f), and became a city of refuge (20 7). One of Samson's exploits was the carrying of the gate of Gaza "to the top of the mountain that is before Hebron" (Jgs 16 3).

David, when a fugitive, received kindness from the people of this city (1 S 30 31); here Abner was treacherously slain by Joab at the gate (2 S 3 27), and the sons of Rimmon, after their hands and feet had been cut off, were hanged "beside the pool" (4 12). After the death of Saul, David was here

3. The Days of the Monarchy

anointed king (5 3) and reigned here 7½ years, until he captured Jerus and made that his capital (5 5); while here, six sons were born to him (3 2). In this city Absalom found a center for his disaffection, and repairing there under pretense of performing a vow to Jeh, he raised the standard of revolt (15 7 f). Jos mistakenly places here the dream of Solomon (Ant, VIII, ii, 1) which occurred at Gibeon (1 K 3 4). Hebron was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Ch 11 10).

Abraham's Oak.

4. Later History

Probably during the captivity Hebron came into the hands of Edom, though it appears to have been colonized by returning Jews (Neh 11 25); it was recovered from Edom by Simon Maccabaeus (1 Macc 5 65; Jos, Ant, XII, viii, 6). In the first great revolt against Rome, Simon bar-Gioras captured the city (BJ, IV, ix, 7), but it was retaken, for Vespasian, by his general Cerealis who carried it by storm, slaughtered the inhabitants and burnt it (ib, 9).

During the Muslim period Hebron has retained its importance on account of veneration to the patriarchs, esp. Abraham; for the same reason it was respected by the Crusaders who called it Castellum ad Sanctum Abraham. In 1165 it became the see of a Lat bishop, but 20 years later it fell to the victorious arms of Saladin, and it has ever since remained a fanatic Moslem center, although regarded as a holy city, alike by Moslem, Jew and Christian.

II. The Ancient Site.—Modern Hebron is a straggling town clustered round the Haram or sacred enclosure built above the traditional cave of Machpelah (q.v.); it is this sacred spot which has determined the present position of the town all through the Christian era, but it is quite evident that an exposed and indefensible situation, running along a valley, like this, could not have been that of earlier and less settled times. From many of the pilgrim narratives, we can gather that for long there had been a tradition that the original site was some distance from the modern town, and, as analogy might suggest, upon a hill. There can be little doubt that the site of the Hebron of OT history is a lofty, olive-covered hill, lying to the W. of the present town, known as er Rumeidy. Upon its summit are cyclopian walls and other traces of ancient occupation. In the midst are the ruins of a mediaeval building known as Dêr el-Arba'in, the "monastery of the forty" (martyrs) about whom the Hebronites have an interesting folklore tale. In the building are shown the so-called tombs of Jesse and Ruth. Near the foot of the hill are several fine old tombs, while to the N. is a large and very ancient Jewish cemetery, the graves of which are each covered with a massive monolith, 5 and 6 ft. long. At the eastern foot of the hill is a perennial spring, 'Ain el Judeideh; the water rises in a vault, roofed by masonry and reached by steps. The environs of this hill are full of folklore associations; the summit would well repay a thorough excavation.

A mile or more to the N.W. of Hebron is the famous oak of Mamre (q.v.), or "Abraham's oak," near which the Russians have erected a hospice. It is a fine specimen of the Holm oak (Quercus coccifera), but is gradually dying. The present site appears to have been pointed out as that of Abraham's tent since the 12th cent.; the earlier traditional site was at Rāmet el Khalîl. See Mamre.

III. Modern Hebron.—Modern Hebron is a city of some 20,000 inhabitants, 85 per cent of whom are Moslems and the remainder mostly Jews. The city is divided into seven quarters, one of which is known as that of the "glass blowers" and another as that of the "water-skin makers." These industries, with the manufacture of pottery, are the main sources of trade. The most conspicuous building is the Haram (see Machpelah). In the town are two large open reservoirs the Birket el Ḳassasin, the "pool of the glass blowers" and Birket es Sultan, "the pool of the Sultan." This latter, which is the larger, is by tradition the site of the execution of the murderers of Ishbosheth (2 S 4 12). The Moslem inhabitants are noted for their fanatical exclusiveness and conservatism, but this has been greatly modified in recent years through the patient and beneficent work of Dr. Paterson, of the U. F. Ch. of S. Med. Mission. The Jews, who number about 1,500, are mostly confined to a special ghetto; they have four synagogues, two Sephardic and two Ashkenazic; they are a poor and unprogressive community.

HEBRON (חֶבְרוֹן, ḥebhrōn, "league," "association"):

(1) The third son of Kohath, son of Levi (Ex 6 18; Nu 3 19.27; 1 Ch 6 2.18; 23 12.19).

(2) A son of Mareshah and descendant of Caleb (1 Ch 2 42.43). See also Korah.

HEBRONITES, hē'brun-īts (חֶבְרוֹנִי, חֶבְרֹנִי, ḥebhrōnī): A family of Levites, descendants of Hebron, third son of Kohath (Nu 3 27; 26 58, etc).

HEDGE, hej:

(1) מְסוּכָה, m^e^ṣūkhāh, "a thorn hedge," only in Mic 7 4; מְשֻׂכָּה, m^e^sukkāh, "a hedge" (Isa 5 5); מְשֻׂכַת חֵדֶק, m^e^sukhath ḥādheḳ, "a hedge of thorns" (Prov 15 19).

(2) גָּדֵר, gādhēr, and גְּדֵרָה, g^e^dhērāh, tr^d^ "hedges" in RV only in Ps 89 40, elsewhere "fence." Gederah (q.v.) in RVm is tr^d^ "hedges" (1 Ch 4 23).

(3) נַעֲצוּץ, na'ăçūç, "thorn-hedges" (Isa 7 19).

(4) φραγμός, phragmós, tr^d^ "hedge" (Mt 21 33; Mk 12 1; Lk 14 23); "partition" in Eph 2 14, which is its literal meaning. In the LXX it is the usual equivalent of the above Heb words.

Loose stone walls without mortar are the usual "fences" around fields in Pal, and this is what gādher and g^edhērāh signify in most passages. Hedges made of cut thorn branches or thorny bushes are very common in the plains and particularly in the Jordan valley.

HEDGEHOG, hej′hog (LXX ἐχῖνος, echînos, "hedgehog," for קִפֹּד, ḳippōdh, in Isa 14 23; 34 11; Zeph 2 14, and for קִפּוֹז, ḳippōz, in Isa 34 15). See Porcupine; Bittern; Owl; Serpent.

HEED, hēd: This word, in the sense of giving careful attention ("take heed," "give heed," etc), represents several Heb and Gr words; chief among them שָׁמַר, shāmar, "to watch"; βλέπω, blépō, "to look," ὁράω, horáō, "to see." As opposed to thoughtlessness, disregard of God's words, of the counsels of wisdom, of care for one's ways, it is constantly inculcated as a duty of supreme importance in the moral and spiritual life (Dt 4 9.15.23; 27 9 AV, etc; Josh 22 5; 23 11; Ps 39 1; Mt 16 6; Mk 4 24; 13 33; Lk 12 15; 1 Cor 3 10; 8 9; 10 12; Col 4 17, etc). HEEL, hēl (עָקֵב, 'āḳēbh): "The iniquity of my heels" (Ps 49 5 AV) is a literal tr, and might be understood to indicate the Psalmist's "false steps," errors or sins, but that meaning is very doubtful here. RV gives "iniquity at my heels." RVm gives a still better sense, "When the iniquity of them that would supplant me compasseth me about, even of them that trust in . . . . riches"—treacherous enemies ever on the watch to trip up a man's heels (cf Hos 12 3). Of Judah it was said, "Thy heels [shall] suffer violence" (Jer 13 22) through being "made bare" (AV), and thus subject to the roughness of the road as she was led captive.

Figurative: (1) Of the partial victory of the evil power over humanity, "Thou shalt bruise [m "lie in wait for"] his heel" (Gen 3 15), through constant, insidious suggestion of the satisfaction of the lower desires. Or if we regard this statement as a part of the Protevangelium, the earliest proclamation of Christ's final and complete victory over sin, the destruction of "the serpent" ("He shall bruise thy head"), then the reference is evidently to Christ's sufferings and death, even to all that He endured in His human nature. (2) Of the stealthy tactics of the tribe of Dan in war, "An adder in the path, that biteth the horse's heels" (Gen 49 17), by which it triumphed over foes of superior strength. (3) Of violence and brutality, "Who . . . . hath lifted up his heel against me" (Ps 41 9; Jn 13 18), i.e. lifted up his foot to trample upon me (cf Josh 10 24). M. O. Evans

HEGAI, hē′gȧ-ī, HEGE, hē′ge (הֵגַי, hēghay; Γαΐ, Gaí [Est 2 8.15], and הֵגֵא, hēghē', Hege [Est 2 3]): One of the officers of the Pers king Ahasuerus; a chamberlain or eunuch (keeper of women), into whose custody the "fair young virgins" were delivered from whom the king intended to choose his queen in the place of the discredited Vashti.

HEGEMONIDES, heg-e-mon′i-dēz, hej-e-mȯ-nī′-dēz (Ἡγεμονίδης, Hēgemonídēs): The Syrian officer placed in command of the district extending from Ptolemaïs to the Gerrenians (2 Macc 13 24). It is not easy to see how in AV and even in Swete's revised text the word can be taken as a mere appellative along with stratēgón, the two being rendered "principal officer": one of the two could certainly be omitted (Swete, 3d ed, 1905, capitalizes Hegemonidēs). In RV the word is taken as the name of some person otherwise unknown.

HEIFER, hef′ẽr (פָּרָה, pārāh, in Nu 19 [see following art.] and Hos 4 16; עֶגְלָה, 'eghlāh, elsewhere in the OT; δάμαλις, dámalis, in He 9 13): For the "heifer of three years old" in AV, RVm of Isa 15 5; Jer 48 34, see Eglath-Shelishiyah. A young cow (contrast Bullock). The 'eghlāh figures specifically in religious rites only in the ceremony of Dt 21 1–9 for the cleansing of the land, where an unexpiated murder had been committed. This was not a sacrificial rite—the priests are witnesses only, and the animal was slain by breaking the neck —but sacrificial purity was required for the heifer. Indeed, it is commonly supposed that the rite as it now stands is a rededication of one that formerly had been sacrificial. In the sacrifices proper the heifer could be used for a peace offering (Lev 3 1), but was forbidden for the burnt (Lev 1 3) or sin (4 3.14) offerings. Hence the sacrifice of 1 S 16 2 was a peace offering. In Gen 15 9 the ceremony of the ratification of the covenant by God makes use of a heifer and a she-goat, but the reason for the use of the females is altogether obscure. Cf following article.

Figuratively: The heifer appears as representing sleekness combined with helplessness in Jer 46 20 (cf the comparison of the soldiers to 'stalled calves' in the next verse). In Jer 50 11; Hos 10 11, the heifer is pictured as engaged in threshing. This was particularly light work, coupled with unusually abundant food (Dt 25 4), so that the threshing heifer served esp. well for a picture of contentment. ("Wanton" in Jer 50 11, however, is an unfortunate tr in RV.) Hosea, in contrast, predicts that the "heifers" shall be set to the hard work of ploughing and breaking the sods. In Jgs 14 18, Samson uses "heifer" in his riddle to refer to his wife. This, however, was not meant to convey the impression of licentiousness that it gives the modern reader. Burton Scott Easton

HEIFER, RED. In Nu 19 a rite is described in which the ashes of a "red heifer" and of certain objects are mixed with running water to obtain the so-called "water for impurity." (Such is the correct tr of ARV in Nu 19 9.13.20.21; 31 23. In these passages, AV and ERV, through a misunderstanding of a rather difficult Heb term, have "water of separation"; LXX and the Vulg have "water of sprinkling." ERVm, "water of impurity," is right, but ambiguous.) This water was employed in the removal of the uncleanness of a person or thing that had been in contact with a dead body, and also in removing ritual defilement from booty taken in war.

1. Origin and Significance of the Rite

The general origin of the rite is clear enough, as is the fact that this origin lies back of the official sacrificial system of Israel. For the removal of impurity, ritual as well as physical, water, preferably running water (ver 17; cf Lev 14 5 ff; 15 13), is the natural means, and is employed universally. But where the impurity was unusually great, mere water was not felt to be adequate, and various substances were mixed with it in order to increase its efficacy. So (among other things) blood is used in Lev 14 6.7, and dust in Nu 5 17 (see Water of Bitterness). The use, however, of ashes in Nu 19 17 is unique in the OT, although parallels from elsewhere can be adduced. So e.g. in Ovid Fasti, iv.639–40, 725, 733, in the last of these references, "The blood of a horse shall be a purification, and the ashes of calves," is remarkably close to the OT. The ashes were obtained by burning the heifer completely, "her skin, and her flesh, and her blood, with her dung" (the contents of the entrails) (ver 5; cf Ex 29 14). Here only in the OT is blood burned for a ceremonial purpose, and here only is burning a preliminary; elsewhere it is either a chief act or serves to consume the remnants of a finished sacrifice—Lev 4 12 and Nu 19 3 are altogether different.

The heifer is a female. For the regular sin offering for the congregation, only the male was permitted (Lev 4 14), but the female was used in the purificatory ceremony of Dt 21 3 (a rite that has several points of similarity to that of Nu 19). An individual sin offering by one of the common people, however, required a female (Lev 4 28), but probably only in order to give greater prominence to the more solemn sacrifices for which the male was reserved. A female is required again in the cases enumerated in Lev 5 1–6, most of which are ritual defilements needing purification; a female was required at the purification of a leper (in addition to two males, Lev 14 10), and a female, with one male, was offered when a Nazirite terminated his vows (Nu 6 14). Some connection between purification and the sacrifice of a female may be established by this list, for even in the case of the Nazirite the idea may be removal of the state of consecration. But the reason for such a connection is anything but obvious, and the various explanations that have been offered are hardly more than guesses. The most likely is that purificatory rites originated in a very primitive stage when the female was thought to be the more sacred animal on account of its greater usefulness. Of the other requirements for the heifer she must be "red," i.e. reddish brown (Nu 19 2). Likeness in color to blood is at first sight the most natural explanation, but likeness in color to ripe grain is almost equally plausible. It may be noted that certain Egyp sacrifices also required red cattle as victims (Plutarch, De Isid. 31). The heifer is to be "without spot" ("faultless"), "wherein is no blemish," the ordinary requirement for sacrifices. (The Jewish exegetes misread this "perfectly red, wherein is no blemish," with extraordinary results; see below.) But an advance on sacrificial requirements is that she shall be one "upon which never came yoke." This requirement is found elsewhere only in Dt 21 3 and in 1 S 6 7 (that the animals in this last case were finally sacrificed is, however, not in point). But in other religions this requirement was very common (cf Iliad x.293; Vergil, Georg. iv.550–51; Ovid, Fasti iv.336).

2. Use of Cedar and Hyssop

While the heifer was being burned, "cedar-wood, and hyssop, and scarlet" (i.e. scarlet wool or thread) were cast into the flames. The same combination of objects (although differently employed) is found at the cleansing of a leper (Lev 14 4), but their meaning is entirely unknown. The explanations offered are almost countless. It is quite clear that hyssop was esp. prized in purifications (Ps 51 7), but the use of hyssop as a sprinkler and the use of ashes of hyssop may be quite unrelated. Hyssop and cedar were supposed to have medicinal properties (see Cedar; Hyssop). Or the point may be the use of aromatic woods. For a mixture of cedar and other substances in water as a purificatory medium cf Fossey, Magie Assyrienne, 285. The scarlet wool offers still greater difficulties, apart from the color, but it may be noted that scarlet wool plays a part in some of the Bab conjurations (Assyr. Bibl., XII, 31). But, obviously, none of this leads very far and it may all be in the wrong direction. All that can be said definitely is that Lev 14 4 and Nu 19 6 show that the combination of objects was deemed to have a high purificatory value.

3. Application and Sacredness of the Ashes

The ashes, when obtained, were used in removing the greatest of impurities. Consequently, they themselves were deemed to have an extraordinarily "consecrated" character, and they were not to be handled carelessly. Their consecration extended to the rite by which they were produced, so that every person engaged in it was rendered unclean (Nu 19 7.8.10), an excellent example of how in primitive religious thought the ideas of "holiness" and "uncleanness" blend. It was necessary to perform the whole ceremony "without the camp" (ver 3), and the ashes, when prepared, were also kept without the camp (ver 9), probably in order to guard against their touch defiling anyone (as well as to keep them from being defiled). When used they were mixed with running water, and the mixture was sprinkled with hyssop on the person or object to be cleansed (vs 17–19). The same water was used to purify booty (31 23), and it may also be meant by the "water of expiation" in 8 7.

4. Of Non-Priestly and Non-Israelitish Origin

In addition to the similarities already pointed out between Nu 19 and Dt 21 1–9, the rites resemble each other also in the fact that, in both, laymen are the chief functionaries and that the priests have little to do (in Dt 21 1–9 they are mere passive witnesses). This suggests a non-priestly origin. The title "sin-offering" in Nu 19 9.17 (unless used in a unique sense) points to an original sacrificial meaning, although in Nu 19 the heifer is carefully kept away from the altar. Again, the correspondences with rites in other religions indicate a non-Israelitish origin. Such a ceremony may well have passed among the Israelites and have become prized by them. It contained nothing objectionable and seemed to have much of deep worth, and a few slight additions—chiefly the sprinkling (ver 4; cf Lev 4 6.17)—made it fit for adoption into the highest system. Some older features may have been eliminated also, but as to this, of course, there is no information. But, in any case, the ceremony is formed of separate rites that are exceedingly old and that are found in a great diversity of religions, so that any elaborate symbolic interpretation of the details would seem to be without justification. The same result can be reached by comparing the countless symbolic interpretations that have been attempted in the past, for they differ hopelessly. As a matter of fact, the immense advance that has been gained in the understanding of the meaning of the OT rites through the comparative study of religions has shown the futility of much that has been written on symbolism. That a certain rite is widely practised may merely mean that it rests on a true instinct. To be sure, the symbolism of the future will be written on broader lines and will be less pretentious in its claims, but for these very reasons it will rest on a more solid basis. At present, however, the chief task is the collection of material and its correct historical interpretation.

5. Obscurity of Later History

The later history of the rite is altogether obscure. As no provision was made in Nu 19 for sending the ashes to different points, the purification could have been practised only by those living near the sanctuary. Rabbinical casuistry still further complicated matters by providing that two black or white hairs from the same follicle would disqualify the heifer (see above), and that one on whom even a cloth had been laid could not be used. In consequence, it became virtually or altogether impossible to secure a proper animal, and the Mishnic statement that only nine had ever been found (Pārāh, iii.5) probably means that the rite had been obsolete long before NT times. Still, the existence of the tractate, Pārāh, and the mention in He 9 13 show that the provisions were well remembered. See also Sacrifice.

Literature.—Baentsch (1903), Holzinger (1903), and (especially) Grey (1903) on Nu; Kennedy in HDB; Edersheim, Temple and Ministry, ch xviii (rabbinic traditions. Edersheim gives the best of the "typological" explanations).

HEIGHT, hīt, HEIGHTS: The Eng. terms represent a large number of Heb words (gōbhah, mārōm, ḳōmāh, rūm, etc). A chief thing to notice is that in RV "height" and "heights" are frequently substituted for other words in AV, as "coast" (Josh 12 23), "region" (1 K 4 11), "borders" (Josh 11 2), "countries" (Josh 17 11), "strength" (Ps 95 4), "high places" (Isa 41 18; Jer 3 2.21; 7 29; 12 12; 14 6), "high palaces" (Ps 78 69). On the other hand, for "height" in AV, RV has "stature" (Ezk 31 5.10), "raised basement" (Ezk 41 8), etc. In the NT we have húpsōma, prop. of space (Rom 8 39), and húpsos of measure (Eph 3 18; Rev 21 16).

1. The Word "Heir"

HEIR, âr: In the NT "heir" is the invariable tr of κληρόνομος, klērónomos (15 t), the technical equivalent in Gr, and of the compound συνκληρόνομος, sunklērónomos, "coheir," in Rom 8 17; Eph 3 6; He 11 9; 1 Pet 3 7 (in Gal 4 30; He 1 14, contrast AV and RV). In the OT "heir" and "to be heir" both represent some form of the common vb. יָרַשׁ, yārash, "possess," and the particular rendition of the vb. as "to be heir" is given only by the context (cf e.g. AV and RV in Jer 49 2; Mic 1 15). Exactly the same is true of the words trd "inherit," "inheritance," which in by far the great majority of cases would have been represented better by "possess," "possession" (see Inheritance and OHL on נחל). Consequently, when God is said, for instance, to have given Palestine to Israel as an 'inheritance' (Lev 20 24, etc), nothing more need be meant than 'given as a possession.' The LXX, however, for the sake of variety in its rendition of Heb words, used klēronoméō in many such cases (esp. Gen 15 7.8; 22 17), and thereby fixed on 'heir' the sense of 'recipient of a gift from God.' And so the word passed in this sense into NT Gr—Rom 4 13.14; Gal 3 29; Tit 3 7; He 6 17; 11 7; Jas 2 5; cf Eph 3 6; He 11 9; 1 Pet 3 7. On the other hand, the literal meaning of the word is found in Mk 12 7 (and ||s) and Gal 4 1—in the latter case being suggested by the transferred meaning in 3 29—while in Rom 8 17; Gal 4 7, the literal and transferred meanings are blended. This blending has produced the phrase "heirs of God," which, literally, is meaningless and which doubtless was formed without much deliberation, although it is perfectly clear. A similar blending has applied "heir" to Christ in He 1 2 (cf Rom 8 17 and perhaps Mk 12 7) as the recipient of all things in their totality. But apart from these "blended" passages, it would be a mistake to think that sonship is always consciously thought of where "heir" is mentioned, and hence too much theological implication should not be assigned the latter word.

2. Heir in OT Law

The heirs of property in the OT were normally the sons and, chief among these, the firstborn. (1) Dt 21 15–17 provides that the firstborn shall inherit a "double portion," whence it would appear that all the other sons shared equally. (It should be noted that in this law the firstborn is the eldest son of the father, not of the mother as in Ex 13 2.) Uncertain, however, is what Dt 21 15–17 means by "wife," and the practice must have varied. In Gen 21 10 the son of the handmaid was not to be heir with Isaac, but in Gen 30 1–13 the sons of Bilhah and Zilpah are reckoned as legitimate children of Jacob. See Marriage. Nor is it clear that Dt 21 15–17 forbids setting aside the eldest son because of his own sin—cf the case of Reuben (Gen 49 3.4; 1 Ch 5 1), although the son of a regular wife (Gen 29 32). The very existence of Dt 21 15–17, moreover, shows that in spite of the absence of formal wills, a man could control to some extent the disposition of his property after his death and that the right of the firstborn could be set aside by the father (1 Ch 26 10). That the royal dignity went by primogeniture is asserted only (in a particular case) in 2 Ch 21 3, and both David (1 K 1 11–13) and Rehoboam (2 Ch 11 21–23) chose younger sons as their successors. A single payment in the father's lifetime could be given in lieu of heritage (Gen 25 6; Lk 15 12), and it was possible for two brothers to make a bargain as to the disposition of the property after the father's death (Gen 25 31–34).

(2) When there were sons alive, the daughters had no right of inheritance, and married daughters had no such right in any case. (Job 42 15 describes an altogether exceptional procedure.) Probably unmarried daughters passed under the charge of the firstborn, as the new head of the family, and he took the responsibility of finding them husbands. Nu 27 1–11; 36 1–12 treat of the case where there were no sons—the daughters inherited the estate, but they could marry only within the tribe, lest the tribal possessions be confused. This right of the daughters, however, is definitely stated to be a new thing, and in earlier times the property probably passed to the nearest male relatives, to whom it went in later times if there were no daughters. In extreme cases, where no other heirs could be found, the property went to the slaves (Gen 15 3; Prov 30 23, noting that the meaning of the latter ver is uncertain), but this could have happened only at the rarest intervals. A curious instance is that of 1 Ch 2 34.35, where property is preserved in the family by marrying the daughter to an Egyp slave belonging to the father; perhaps some adoption-idea underlies this.

(3) The wife had no claim on the inheritance, though the disposition made of her dowry is not explained, and it may have been returned to her. If she was childless she resorted to the Levirate marriage (Dt 25 5–10). If this was impracticable or was without issue she returned to her own family and might marry another husband (Gen 38 11; Lev 22 13; Ruth 1 8). The inferior wives (concubines) were part of the estate and went to the heir; indeed, possession of the father's concubines was proof of possession of his dignities (2 S 16 21.22; 1 K 2 13–25). At least, such was the custom in the time of David and Solomon, but at a later period nothing is heard of the practice.

(4) The disposition of land is a very obscure question. Nu 36 4 states explicitly that each heir had a share, but the continual splitting up of an estate through successive generations would have produced an impossible state of affairs. Possibly the land went to the eldest born as part of his portion, possibly in some cases it was held in common by the members of the family, possibly some member bought the shares of the others, possibly the practice differed at different times. But our ignorance of the facts is complete.

Note.—The dates assigned by different scholars to the passages cited have an important bearing on the discussion.

HELAH, hē'lä (חֶלְאָה, ḥel'āh): A wife of Ashhur, father of Tekoa (1 Ch 4 5.7).

HELAM, hē′lam (חֵילָם, ḥēlām, 2 S 10 16 f; in ver 17 with ה locale; LXX Αἰλάμ, Hailám): A place near which David is said to have defeated the Aramaean world under Hadarezer (2 S 10 16 ff). Its site is unknown. Cornill and others introduce it into the text of Ezk 47 16 from the LXX (Ἡλιάμ, Hēliám). This would place it between the territories of Damascus and Hamath, which is not unreasonable. Some scholars identify it with Aleppo, which seems too far north.

HELBAH, hel′ba (חֶלְבָּה, ḥelbāh): A place in the territory assigned to Asher (Jgs 1 31). It may be identical with Mahalliba of Sennacherib's prism inscription. The site, however, has not been recovered.

HELBON, hel′bon (חֶלְבּוֹן, ḥelbōn; Χελβών, Chelbṓn, Χεβρών, Chebrṓn): A district from which Tyre received supplies of wine through the Damascus market (Ezk 27 18); universally admitted to be the modern Halbun, a village at the head of a fruitful valley of the same name among the chalk slopes on the eastern side of Anti-Lebanon, 13 miles N.N.W of Damascus, where traces of ancient vineyard terracing still exist. Records contemporary with Ezk mention mat helbunim or the land of Helbon, whence Nebuchadnezzar received wine for sacrificial purposes (Belinno Cylinder, I, 23), while karan hulbunu, or Helbonian wine, is named in WAI, II, 44. Strabo (xv.735) also tells that the kings of Persia esteemed it highly. The district is still famous for its grapes—the best in the country—but these are mostly made into raisins, since the population is now Moslem. Helbon must not be confounded with Chalybon (Ptol. v.15, 17), the Gr-Rom province of Haleb or Aleppo.

HELCHIAH, hel-kī′a. See HELKIAS.

HELDAI, hel′dă-ī (חֶלְדַּי, ḥelday):

(1) A captain of the temple-service, appointed for the 12th month (1 Ch 27 15). Same as Heled (חֵלֶד, ḥēledh) in ‖ list (cf 1 Ch 11 30), and is probably also to be identified with Heleb, son of Baanah the Metophathite, one of David's heroic leaders (2 S 23 29).

(2) One of a company of Jews who brought gifts of gold and silver from Babylon to assist the exiles under Zerubbabel (Zec 6 10).

HELEB, hē′leb (חֵלֶב, ḥēlebh, 2 S 23 29). See HELDAI.

HELED, hē′led (חֵלֶד, ḥēledh, 1 Ch 11 30). See HELDAI.

HELEK, hē′lek (חֵלֶק, ḥēlekh): Son of Gilead the Manassite (Nu 26 30; Josh 17 2). Patronymic, Helekites (Nu 26 30).

HELEM, hē′lem:

(1) הֵלֶם, hēlem; LXX B, Βαλαάμ, Baladm, omitting "son," A, υἱός 'Ελάμ, huiós Elám, "son of Elam" (1 Ch 7 35). A great-grandson of Asher, called Hotham in ver 32. The form "Elam" appears as the name of a Levite in 1 Esd 8 33.

(2) חֵלֶם, ḥēlem, "strength," regarded by LXX as a common noun (Zec 6 14). One of the ambassadors from the Jews of the exile to Jerus; probably the person called Heldai in ver 10 is meant.

HELEPH, hē′lef (חֵלֶף, ḥeleph): A place on the southern border of Naphtali (Josh 19 33); unidentified.

HELEZ, hē′lez (חֶלֶץ, ḥeleç, "vigor"; LXX Σέλλης, Séllēs, Χέλλης, Chéllēs):

(1) 2 S 23 26; 1 Ch 11 27; 27 10. One of David's mighty men; according to 1 Ch 27 10, he belonged to the sons of Ephraim and was at the head of the 7th course in David's organization of the kingdom.

(2) LXX Chellēs, 1 Ch 2 39. A man of Judah of the clan of the Jerahmeelites.

HELI, hē′lī (Ἡλεί, Hēleí for עֵלִי, 'ēlī):

(1) The father of Joseph, the husband of Mary, in St. Luke's account of the genealogy of Jesus (Lk 3 23).

(2) An ancestor of Ezra (2 Esd 1 2).

HELIODORUS, hē-li-ō-dō′rus (Ἡλιόδωρος, Hēliódōros): Treasurer of the Syrian king Seleucus IV, Philopator (187–175 BC), the immediate predecessor of Antiochus Epiphanes who carried out to its utmost extremity the Hellenizing policy begun by Seleucus and the "sons of Tobias." Greatly in want of money to pay the tribute due to the Romans as one of the results of the victory of Scipio over Antiochus the Great at Magnesia (190 BC), Seleucus learned from Apollonius, governor of Coele-Syria (Pal) and Phoenicia, of the wealth which was reported to be stored up in the Temple at Jerus and commissioned H. (2 Macc 3) to plunder the temple and to bring its contents to him. On the wealth collected in the Temple at this time, Jos (Ant, IV, vii, 2) may be consulted. The Temple seems to have served the purposes of a bank in which the private deposits of widows and orphans were kept for greater security, and in 2 Macc 3 15–21 is narrated the panic at Jerus which took place when H. came with an armed guard to seize the contents of the Temple (see Stanley, Lectures on the History of the Jewish Church, III, 287). In spite of the protest of Onias, the high priest, H. was proceeding to carry out his commission when, "through the Lord of Spirits and the Prince of all power," a great apparition appeared which caused him to fall down "compassed with great darkness" and speechless. When "quite at the last gasp" he was by the intercession of Onias restored to life and strength and "testified to all men the works of the great God which he had beheld with his eyes." The narrative given in 2 Macc 3 is not mentioned by any other historian, though 4 Macc refers to the plundering of the Temple and assigns the deed to Apollonius. Raffaelle used the incident in depicting, on the walls of the Vatican, the triumph of Pope Julius II over the enemies of the Pontificate.

HELIOPOLIS, hē-li-op′ō-lis. See ON.

HELKAI, hel′kă-ī, hel′kī, hel-kā′ī (חֶלְקָי, ḥelḳāy, perhaps an abbreviation for Helkiah, "Jeh is my portion." Not in LXX B; LXX L, Χελκίας, Chelkías [Neh 12 15]): The head of a priestly house in the days of Joiakim.

HELKATH, hel′kath (חֶלְקַת, ḥelḳath [Josh 19 25]; ḥelḳāth [21 31]; by a scribal error ḥūḳōḳ [1 Ch 6 75]): A town or district on the border of Asher, assigned to the Levites; unidentified.

HELKATH-HAZZURIM, hel′kath-haz′ū-rim, -ha-zū′rim (חֶלְקַת הַצֻּרִים, ḥelḳath ha-çūrīm; Μερὶς τῶν ἐπιβουλῶν, Merís tōn epiboulṓn): The name as it stands means "field of the sword edges," and is applied to the scene of the conflict in which twelve champions each from the army of Joab and that of Abner perished together, each slaying his fellow (2 S 2 16). Some, following LXX, would read חֶלְקַת הַצֹּדִים, ḥelḳath ha-çōdhīm, "field of the crafty," i.e. "of the ambush." Thenius suggested ח' הַצָּרִים, ḥelḳath ha-çārīm, "field of the adversaries" (see also H. P. Smith, ICC, "Samuel," 271). Probably, however, the text as it stands is correct.

HELKIAS, hel-kī'as (חִלְקִיָּה, ḥilḳīyāh; Χελκίας, Chelkias; AV Chelcias):

(1) Father of Susanna (Sus vs 2.29.63). According to tradition he was brother of Jeremiah, and he is identified with the priest who found the Book of the Law in the time of Josiah (2 K 22 8).

(2) Ancestor of Baruch (Bar 1 1).

(3) Father of Joiakim the high priest (Bar 1 7). The name represents HILKIAH (q.v.).

HELL, hel (see SHEOL; HADES; GEHENNA): The Eng. word, from a Teutonic root meaning "to hide" or "cover," had originally the significance of the world of the dead generally, and in this sense is used by Chaucer, Spenser, etc, and in the Creed ("He descended into hell"); cf ERV Preface. Now the word has come to mean almost exclusively the place of punishment of the lost or finally impenitent; the place of torment of the wicked. In AV of the Scriptures, it is the rendering adopted in many places in the OT for the Heb word sh^e'ōl (in 31 out of 65 occurrences of that word it is so tr^d), and in all places, save one (1 Cor 15 55) in the NT, for the Gr word Hades (this word occurs 11 t; in 10 of these it is tr^d "hell"; 1 Cor 15 55 reads "grave," with "hell" in m). In these cases the word has its older general meaning, though in Lk 16 23 (parable of Rich Man and Lazarus) it is specially connected with a place of "torment," in contrast with the "Abraham's bosom" to which Lazarus is taken (ver 22).

1. The Word in AV

In the above cases RV has introduced changes, replacing "hell" by "Sheol" in the passages in the OT (ERV retains "hell" in Isa 14 9.15; ARV makes no exception), and by "Hades" in the passages in the NT (see under these words).

2. The Word in RV

Besides the above uses, and more in accordance with the modern meaning, the word "hell" is used in the NT in AV as the equivalent of Gehenna (12 t; Mt 5 22.29; 10 28, etc). RV in these cases puts "Gehenna" in m. Originally the Valley of Hinnom, near Jerus, Gehenna became among the Jews the synonym for the place of torment in the future life (the "Gehenna of fire," Mt 5 22, etc; see GEHENNA).

3. Gehenna

In yet one other passage in the NT (2 Pet 2 4), "to cast down to hell" is used (AV and RV) to represent the Gr tartaróō, ("to send into Tartarus"). Here it stands for the place of punishment of the fallen angels: "spared not angels when they sinned, but cast them down to hell, and committed them to pits [or chains] of darkness" (cf Jude ver 6; but also Mt 25 41). Similar ideas are found in certain of the Jewish apocalyptic books (Book of En, Book of Jub, Apoc Bar, with apparent reference to Gen 6 1–4; cf ESCHATOLOGY OF THE OT).

4. Tartarus

On the theological aspect, see PUNISHMENT, EVERLASTING. For literature, see references in above-named arts., and cf art. "Hell" by Dr. D. S. Salmond in HDB.

JAMES ORR

HELLENISM, hel'en-iz'm, HELLENIST, hel'en-ist: Hellenism is the name we give to the manifold achievements of the Greeks in social and political institutions, in the various arts, in science and philosophy, in morals and religion. It is customary to distinguish two main periods, between which stands the striking figure of Alexander the Great, and to apply to the earlier period the adj. "Hellenic," that of "Hellenistic" to the latter. While there is abundant reason for making this distinction, it must not be considered as resting upon fortuitous changes occasioned by foreign influences. The Hellenistic age is rather the sudden unfolding of a flower whose bud was forming and maturing for centuries.

1. The Expansion of the Greek Peoples

Before the coming of the Hellenic peoples into what we now call Greece, there existed in those lands a flourishing civilization to which we may give the name "Aegean." The explorations of archaeologists during the last few decades have brought it to light in many places on the continent, as well as on the islands of the Aegean and notably in Crete. When the Hellenic peoples came, it was not as a united nation, nor even as homogeneous tribes of a common race; though without doubt predominantly of kindred origin, it was the common possession of an Aryan speech and of similar customs and religion that marked them off from the peoples among whom they settled. When their southward movement from Illyria occurred, and by what causes it was brought about, we do not know; but it can hardly have long antedated the continuance of this migration which led to the settlement of the coast districts of Asia Minor and the islands of the Aegean from about the 13th to the 10th cents. BC. In the colonization of these new territories the Hellenic peoples became conscious of their kinship, partly because the several colonies received contingents from various regions of the motherland, partly because they were in common brought into striking contrast to the alien "Barbarians" who spoke other unintelligible languages. As the older communities on the mainland and on the islands began to flourish, they felt the need, arising from various causes, for further colonization. Among these causes we may mention the poverty of the soil in Greece proper, the restricting pressure of the strong tribes of Asia Minor who prevented expansion inland, a growing disaffection with the aristocratic régime in almost all Gr states and with the operation of the law of primogeniture in land tenure, and lastly the combined lure of adventure and the prospect of trade. Thus it came about that in the 8th and 7th cents. BC, two great movements of colonial expansion set in, one toward the Hellespont and to the shores of the Pontus, or Black Sea, beyond, the other westward toward Southern Italy, Sicily, and beyond as far as Gades in Spain. To the 7th cent. belongs also the colonization of Naucratis in Egypt and of Cyrene in Libya. Then followed a period of relative inactivity during the 5th cent., which was marked by the desperate conflict of the Greeks with Persia in the E. and with Carthage in the W., succeeded by even more disastrous conflicts among themselves. With the enforced internal peace imposed by Macedonia came the resumption of colonial and military expansion in a measure before undreamed of. In a few years the empire of Alexander embraced Thrace, Asia Minor, Egypt, and Asia eastward beyond the Indus. The easternmost regions soon fell away, but Asia Minor, Syria and Egypt long continued under Gr rule, until Rome in the 1st cent. BC made good her claims to sovereignty in those lands.

Throughout this course of development and expansion we speak of the people as Greeks, although it is evident that even such racial homogeneity as they may have had on coming into Greece must have been greatly modified by the absorption of conquered peoples. But the strong individuality of the Hellenic population manifested itself everywhere in its civilization.

2. The Hellenic State

In the evolution from the Homeric kingship (supported by the nobles in council, from which the commonalty was excluded, or where it was supposed at most to express assent or dissent to proposals laid before it) through oligarchic or aristocratic rule and the usurped authority of the tyrants, to the establishment of democratic government, there is nothing surprising to the man of today. That is because Gr civilization has become typical of all western civilization. In the earlier stages of this process, moreover, there is nothing strikingly at variance with the institutions of the Hebrews, at least so far as concerns the outward forms. But there existed throughout a subtle difference of spirit which made it possible, even inevitable, for the Greeks to attain to democratic institutions, whereas to the Hebrews such a development was impossible, if not unthinkable. It is difficult to define this spirit, but one may say that it was marked from the first by an inclination to permit the free development and expression of individuality subordinated to the common good; by a corresponding recognition of human limitations over against one's fellow-man as over against Deity; by an instinctive dread of excess as inhuman and provoking the just punishment of the gods; and lastly by a sane refusal to take oneself too seriously, displaying itself in a certain good-humored irony even among men who, like Socrates and Epicurus, regarded themselves as charged with a sublime mission, in striking contrast with the Heb prophets who voiced the thunders of Sinai, but never by any chance smiled at their own earnestness. Even the Macedonians did not attempt to rule Greece with despotic sway, leaving the states in general in the enjoyment of their liberties; and in the Orient, Alexander and his successors, Rom as well as Gr, secured their power and extended civilization by the foundation and encouragement of Hellenic cities in extraordinary numbers. The city-state, often confederated with other city-states, displaced the organization of tribe or clan, thus substituting a new unit and a new interest for the old; and the centers thus created radiated Hellenic influence and made for order and good government everywhere. But in accordance with the new conditions the state took on a somewhat different form. While the city preserved local autonomy, the state became monarchical; and the oriental deification of the king reinforced by the Hellenic tendency to deify the benefactors of mankind, eventuated in modes of speech and thought which powerfully influenced the Messianic hopes of the Jews.

3. Hellenic Life

The life of the Greeks, essentially urban and dominated by political interests fostered in states in which the individual counted for much, was of a type wholly different from the oriental. Although the fiction of consanguinity was cultivated by the Hellenic city-state as by the Sem tribe, it was more transparent in the former, particularly in the newer communities formed in historical times. There was thus a powerful stimulus to mutual tolerance and concession which, supported as it was by the strong love of personal independence and the cultivation of individuality, led to the development of liberty and the recognition of the rights of man. A healthy social life was the result for those who shared the privileges of citizenship, and also, in hardly less degree, for those resident aliens who received the protection of the state. Women also, though not so free as men, enjoyed, even at Athens where they were most limited, liberties unknown to the Orientals. In the Hellenistic age they attained a position essentially similar to that of modern Europe. There were slaves belonging both to individuals and the state, but their lot was mitigated in general by a steadily growing humanity. The amenities of life were many, and were cultivated no less in the name of religion than of art, literature, and science.

4. Hellenic Art and Letters

As in every phase of Gr civilization, the development of art and letters was free. Indeed their supreme excellence must be attributed to the happy circumstances which suffered them to grow spontaneously from the life of the people without artificial constraints imposed from within, or overpowering influences coming from without: a fortune which no other great movement in art or letters can boast. Gr art was largely developed in the service of religion; but owing to the circumstance that both grew side by side, springing from the heart of man, their reactions were mutual, art contributing to religion quite as much as it received. The creative genius of the Hellenic people expressed itself with singular directness and simplicity in forms clearly visualized and subject to the conditions of psychologically effective grouping in space or time. Their art is marked by the observance of a just proportion and by a certain natural restraint due to the preponderance of the intellectual element over the purely sensuous. Its most characteristic product is the ideal type in which only enough individuality enters to give to the typical the concreteness of life. What has been said of art in the narrower sense applies equally to artistic letters. The types thus created, whether in sculpture, architecture, music, drama, history, or oratory, though not regarded with superstitious reverence, commended themselves by the sheer force of inherent truth and beauty to succeeding generations, thus steadying the course of development and restraining the exuberant originality and the tendency to individualism. In the Hellenistic age, individualism gradually preponderated where the lessening power of creative genius did not lead to simple imitation.

5. Philosophy of Nature and of Conduct

The traditional views of the Hellenic peoples touching Nature and conduct, which did not differ widely from those of other peoples in a corresponding stage of culture, maintained themselves down to the 7th cent. BC with comparatively little change. Along with and following the colonial expansion of Hellenism there came the awakening intellectual curiosity, or rather the shock of surprise necessary to convert attention into question. The mythology of the Greeks had contained a vague theology, without authority indeed, but satisfactory because adequate to express the national thought. Ethics there was none, morality being customary. But the extending horizon of Hellenic thought discovered that customs differed widely in various lands; indeed, it is altogether likely that the collection of strange and shocking customs which filled the quivers of the militant Sophists in the 5th cent. had its inception in the 6th and possibly the 7th cent. At any rate it furnished the fiery darts of the adversary until ethics was founded in reason by the quest of Socrates for the universal, not in conduct, but in judgment. As ethics arose out of the irreconcilable contradictions of conduct, so natural philosophy sprung from the contradictions of mythical theology and in opposition to it. There were in fact two strata of conceptions touching supernatural beings; one, growing out of a primitive animism, regarded their operations essentially from the point of view of magic, which refuses to be surprised at any result, be it never so ill-proportioned to the means employed, so long as the mysterious word was spoken or the requisite act performed; the other, sprung from a worship of Nature in her most striking phenomena, recognized an order, akin to the moral order, in her operations. When natural philosophy arose in the 6th cent., it instinctively at first, then consciously, divested Nature of personality by stripping off the disguise of myth and substituting a plain and reasoned tale founded on mechanical principles. This is the spirit which pervades pre-Socratic science and philosophy. The quest of Socrates for universally valid judgments on conduct directed thought to the laws of mind, which are teleological, in contradistinction to the laws of matter, which are mechanical; and thus in effect dethroned Nature, regarded as material, by giving primacy to mind. Henceforth Gr philosophy was destined, with relatively few and unimportant exceptions, to devote itself to the study of human conduct and to be essentially idealistic, even where the foundation, as with the Stoics, was ostensibly materialistic. More and more it became true of the Gr philosophers that they sought God, "if haply they might feel after him and find him," conscious of the essential unity of the Divine and the human, and defining philosophy as the endeavor to assimilate the soul to God.

6. Hellenic and Hellenistic Religion

The Homeric poems present a picture of Gr life as seen by a highly cultivated aristocratic society having no sympathy with the commonalty. Hence we are not to regard Homeric religion as the religion of the Hellenic peoples in the Homeric age. Our first clear view of the Hellenic commoner is presented by Hesiod in the 8th cent. Here we find, alongside of the worship of the Olympians, evidences of chthonian cults and abundant hints of human needs not satisfied by the well-regulated religion of the several city-states. The conventionalized monarchy of Zeus ruling over his fellow-Olympians is known to be a fiction of the poets, having just as much—no more—foundation, in fact, as the mythical overlordship of Agamemnon over the assembled princes of the Achaeans; while it caught the imagination of the Greeks and dominated their literature, each city-state possessed its own shrines sacred to its own gods, who might or might not be called by the names of Olympians. Yet the great shrines which attracted Greeks from every state, such as those of Zeus at Dodona (chiefly in the period before the 7th cent.) and Olympia, of Apollo at Delos and Delphi, and of Hera at Argos, were the favored abodes of Olympians. Only one other should be mentioned: that of Demeter at Eleusis. Her worship was of a different character, and the great repute of her shrine dates from the 5th cent. If the Zeus of Olympia was predominantly the benign god of the sky, to whom men came in joyous mood to delight him with pomp and festive gatherings, performing feats of manly prowess in the Olympic games, the Zeus of Dodona, and the Delphian Apollo, as oracular deities, were visited in times of doubt and distress. The 7th and 6th cents. mark the advent—or the coming into prominence—of deities whose appeal was to the deepest human emotions, of ecstatic enthusiasm, of fear, and of hope. Among them we must mention Dionysus, the god of teeming Nature (see DIONYSUS), and Orpheus. With their advent comes an awakening of the individual soul, whose aspiration to commune with Deity found little satisfaction in the general worship of the states. Private organizations and quasi-monastic orders, like those of the Orphics and Pythagoreans, arose and won countless adherents. Their deities found admission into older shrines, chiefly those of chthonian divinities, like that of Demeter at Eleusis, and wrought a change in the spirit and to a certain extent in the ritual of the "mysteries" practised there. It was in these "mysteries" that the Christian Fathers, according to the mood or the need, polemic or apologetic, of the moment, saw now the propaedeutic type, now the diabolically instituted counterfeit, of the sacraments and ordinances of the church. The spirit and even the details of the observances of the "mysteries" are difficult to determine; but one must beware of accepting the hostile judgments of Christian writers who were in fact retorting upon the Greeks criticisms leveled at the church: both were blinded by partisanship and so misread the symbols.

If we thus find a true praeparatio evangelica in the Hellenistic developments of earlier Hellenic religion, there are parallel developments in the other religions which were adopted in the Hellenistic age. The older national religions of Persia and Egypt underwent a similar change, giving rise respectively to the worship of Mithra and of Isis, both destined, along with the chthonian mysteries of the Greeks, to be dangerous rivals for the conquest of the world of Christianity, itself a younger son in this prolific family of new religions. Space is wanting here for a consideration of these religious movements, the family resemblance of which with Christianity is becoming every day more apparent; but so much at least should be said, that while every candid student must admit the superiority of Christianity in moral content and adaptation to the religious nature of man, the difference in these respects was not at first sight so obvious that the successful rival might at the beginning of the contest have been confidently predicted. See GREECE, RELIGION OF.

As with other manifestations of the Hellenic spirit, so, too, in matters of religion, it was the free development of living institutions that most strikingly distinguishes the Greeks from the Hebrews. They had priests, but were never ruled by them; they possessed a literature regarded with veneration, and in certain shrines treasured sacred writings containing directions for the practice and ritual of the cults, but they were neither intended nor suffered to fix for all time the interpretation of the symbols. In the 5th and 4th cents. the leaders of Gr thought rebuked the activity of certain priests, and it was not before the period of Rom dominion that priests succeeded even in a small measure in usurping power, and sacred writings began to exercise an authority remotely comparable to that recognized among the Jews.

A most interesting question is that concerning the extent to which Gr civilization and thought had penetrated and influenced Judaism. During three centuries before the advent of Jesus, Hellenism had been a power in Syria and Judaea. The earliest writings of the Hebrews showing this influence are Dnl and the OT Apoc. Several books of the Apoc were originally written in Gr, and show strong influence of Gr thought. The LXX, made for the Jews of the Dispersion, early won its way to authority even in Pal, where Aram. had displaced Heb, which thus became a dead language known only to a few. NT quotations of the OT are almost without exception taken from the LXX. Thus the sacred literature of the Jews was for practical purposes Gr. Though Jesus spoke Aram., He unquestionably knew some Gr. Yet there is no clear evidence of specifically Gr influence on this thought, the presuppositions of which are Jewish or generally those of the Hellenistic age. All the writings of the NT were originally composed in Gr, though their authors differed widely in the degree of proficiency in the use of the language and in acquaintance with Hellenic thought. Their debt to these sources can be profitably considered only in connection with the individual writers; but one who is acquainted with the Heb and Gr literature instinctively feels in reading the NT that the national character of the Jews, as reflected in the OT, has all but vanished, remaining only as a subtle tone of moral earnestness and as an imaginative coloring, except in the simple story of the Synoptic Gospels. But for the bitterness aroused by the destruction of Jerus, it is probable that the Jews would have yielded completely to Hellenic influences. William Arthur Heidel

HELM, helm. See Ships.

HELMET, hel′met. See Arms, Armor.

HELON, hē′lon (חֵלֹן, ḥēlōn, "valorous"; LXX B, Χαιλών, Chailôn): The father of Eliab, the prince of the tribe of Zebulun (Nu 1 9; 2 7; 7 24. 29; 10 16).

HELP: With the sense of that which brings aid, support, or deliverance, "help" (noun and vb.) represents a large variety of words in Heb and Gr (noun 7, vb. 16). A principal Heb word is עָזַר, 'āzar, "to help," with the corresponding nouns עֵזֶר, 'ēzer, עֶזְרָה, 'ezrāh; a chief Gr word is βοηθέω, boēthéō (Mt 15 25; Mk 9 22.24, etc). True help is to be sought for in Jeh, in whom, in the OT, the believer is constantly exhorted to trust, with the renouncing of all other confidences (Ps 20 2; 33 20; 42 5; 46 1; 115 9.10.11; 121 2; Isa 41 10. 13.14, etc). In Rom 8 26 it is said, "the Spirit also helpeth our infirmity," the vb. here (sunantilambánetai) having the striking meaning of to "take hold along with one." In the story of Eden, Eve is spoken of as "a help meet" for Adam (Gen 2 18.20). The idea in "meet" is not so much "suitability," though that is implied, as likeness, correspondence in nature (Vulg similem sibi). One like himself, as taken from him, the woman would be an aid and companion to the man in his tasks. James Orr

HELPMEET, help′mēt. See Help.

HELPS (ἀντιλήμψεις, antilēmpseis, 1 Cor 12 28): In classical Gr the word antilēmpsis means "remuneration," the hold one has on something, then perception, apprehension. But in Bib. Gr it has an altruistic meaning. Thus it is used in the LXX, both in the OT Scriptures and in the Apocrypha (Ps 22 19; 89 19; 1 Esd 8 27; 2 Macc 15 7). Thus we obtain a clue to its meaning in our text, where it has been usually understood as referring to the deacons, the following word kubernēseis, trd "governments," being explained as referring to the presbyters. Henry E. Dosker

HELPS (βοήθειαι, boētheiai, Acts 27 17). See Ships and Boats, III, 2.

HELVE, helv (עֵץ, 'ēç, "wood," "tree"): The handle or wooden part of an ax. "The head [m "iron"] slippeth from the helve" (m "tree," Dt 19 5). The marginal reading suggests that "the ax is supposed to glance off the tree it is working on."

HEM (κράσπεδον, kráspedon): The classic instance of the use of "hem" in the NT is Mt 9 20 AV (cf 14 36), where the woman "touched the hem of his [Christ's] garment." The reference is to the fringe or tassel with its traditional blue thread which the faithful Israelite was directed to wear on the corners of the outer garment (Nu 15 37 ff; Dt 22 12). Great importance came to be attached to it, the ostentatious Pharisees making it very broad or large (Mt 23 5). Here the woman clearly thought there might be peculiar virtue in touching the tassel or fringe of Jesus' garment. Elsewhere the word is rendered Border (q.v.). See also Dress; Fringe. Geo. B. Eager

HEMAN, hē′man (הֵימָן, hēmān, "faithful"): The name of two men in the OT.

(1) A musician and seer, a Levite, son of Joel and grandson of the prophet Samuel; of the family of the Kohathites (1 Ch 6 33), appointed by David as one of the leaders of the temple-singing (1 Ch 15 17; 2 Ch 5 12). He had 14 sons (and 3 daughters) who assisted their father in the chorus. Heman seems also to have been a man of spiritual power; is called "the king's seer in matters of God" (1 Ch 25 5; 2 Ch 35 15).

(2) One of the noted wise men prior to, or about, the time of Solomon. He was one of the three sons of Mahol (1 K 4 31 [Heb 5 11]); also called a son of Zerah (1 Ch 2 6).

Ps 88 is inscribed to Heman the Ezrahite, who is probably to be identified with the second son of Zerah. Edward Babgy Pollard

HEMATH, hē′math. See Hammath (1 Ch 2 55).

HEMDAN, hem′dan (חֶמְדָּן, ḥemdān, "pleasant"): A descendant of Seir, the Horite (Gen 36 26). Wrongly trd "Amram" by AV in 1 Ch 1 41 (RV "Hamran"), where the transcribers made an error in one vowel and one consonant, writing ḥamrān (חַמְרָן), instead of ḥemdān (חֶמְדָּן).

HEMLOCK, hem′lock. See Gall.

HEN, hen (חֵן, ḥēn, "favor"). In Zec 6 14, EV reads, "And the crowns shall be to Helem . . . . and to Hen the son of Zephaniah." But as this person is called Josiah in ver 10, RVm "and for the kindness of the son of Zephaniah" is probably right, but the text is uncertain. See Josiah.

HEN (ὄρνις, órnis): Mentioned in the accounts of the different disciples in describing the work of Jesus (Mt 23 37; Lk 13 34).

HENA, hē′na (הֵנַע, hēna'; 'Ανά, Aná): Named in 2 K 19 13, as one of the cities destroyed by Sennacherib along with Sepharvaim. It does not appear in a similar connection in 17 24. The text is probably corrupt. No reasonable identification has been proposed. Cheyne (EB, s.v.) says of the phrase "Hena and Ivah" that "underlying this is a witty editorial suggestion that the existence of cities called הנע and עוה respectively has passed out of mind (cf Ps 9 6[7]), for הֵנַע וְעִוָּה, hēna' we-'iwwāh, clearly means 'he has driven away and overturned' (so Tg, Sym)." He would drop out הנע. Hommel (Expos T, IX, 330) thinks that here we have divine names; Hena standing for the Arab. star-name al-han'a, and Ivvah for al-'awwā'u. See Ivah. W. Ewing

HENADAD, hen′a-dad (חֵנָדָד, ḥēnādhādh, "favor of Hadad"; LXX 'Ηναάδ, Hēnaád; 'Ηναδάδ, Hēnadád; 'Ηναδάβ, Hēnadáb; 'Ηναλάβ, Hēnaláb [Ezr 3 9; Neh 3 18.24; 10 9]): One of the heads of the Levites in the post-exilic community.

HENNA, hen′a (Cant 1 14; 4 13): An aromatic plant.

HENOCH, hē′nok (חֲנוֹךְ, ḥănōkh; 'Ενώχ, Henôch; in 1 Ch 1 3 AV RV, "Enoch"; in Gen 25 4, AV and RV "Hanoch"; 1 Ch 1 33, AV "Henoch," RV "Hanoch"): The name of a Midianite, a descendant of Abram.

HEPHER, hē′fẽr, HEPHERITES, hē′fẽr-īts (חֵפֶר, ḥēpher, חֶפְרִי, ḥephrī):

(1) LXX Ὄφερ, Hópher (Nu 26 32 f; 27 1; Josh 17 2 f), the head of a family or clan of the tribe of Manasseh. The clan is called the Hepherites in Nu 26 32.

(2) LXX Ἡφάλ, Hēphál (1 Ch 4 6), a man of Judah.

(3) LXX Ὄφερ, Hópher (1 Ch 11 36), one of David's heroes.

HEPHER (חֵפֶר, ḥēpher):

(1) LXX Ὄφερ, Hópher (Josh 12 17), a Canaanitish town mentioned between Tappuah and Aphek, unidentified.

(2) In 1 K 4 10 a district connected with Socoh, and placed by Solomon under the direction of Ben-hesed of Arubboth, unidentified.

HEPHZIBAH, hef′zi-ba (חֶפְצִי־בָהּ, ḥephçī-bhāh, "my delight is in her"):

(1) LXX Ὀψειβά, Hopseibá, Ἀψειβά, Hapseibá, Ὀφσιβά, Hophsibá, the mother of Manasseh (2 K 21 1).

(2) The new name of Zion (Isa 62 4); LXX translates Θέλημα ἐμόν, Thélēma emón, "my delight."

HERAKLES, her′a-klēz (Ἡρακλῆς, Hēraklḗs). See Hercules.

HERALD, her′ald: The word occurs once (Dnl 3 4) as the tr of the Aram. word כָּרוֹז, kārōz (cf κήρυξ, kḗrux): "Then the herald cried aloud." See also Games.

HERB, hûrb, ûrb:

(1) יָרָק, yārāḳ, "green thing" (Ex 10 15; Isa 15 6); "a garden of herbs" (Dt 11 10; 1 K 21 2); "[a dinner, m portion of] herbs" (Prov 15 17).

(2) עֵשֶׂב, 'ēsebh; cf Arab. 'ushb, "herbage," "grass," etc; "herbs yielding seed" (Gen 1 11); "herbage" for food (Gen 1 30; Jer 14 6); tr^d "grass" (Dt 11 15; Am 7 2); "herbs" (Prov 27 25, etc).

(3) דֶּשֶׁא, deshe', tr^d "herb" (2 K 19 26; Prov 27 25; Isa 37 27; 66 14 AV), but generally Grass (q.v.).

(4) חָצִיר, ḥāçīr, vegetation generally, but tr^d Grass (q.v.).

(5) אֹרֹת, אוֹרֹת, 'ōrōth (pl. only), "green plants" or "herbs." In 2 K 4 39 the Talm interprets it to mean "colewort," but it may mean any edible herbs which had survived the drought. In Isa 26 19 the expression "dew of herbs" is in m tr^d "dew of light" which is more probable (see Dew), and the tr "heat upon herbs" (Isa 18 4 AV) is in RV tr^d "clear heat in sunshine."

(6) βοτάνη, botánē (He 6 7).

(7) λάχανα, láchana = yārāḳ (Mt 13 32). See also Bitter Herbs. E. W. G. Masterman

HERCULES, hûr′kū-lēz (Ἡρακλῆς, Hēraklḗs): The process of Hellenizing the Jews which began at an earlier date was greatly promoted under Antiochus Epiphanes (175–164 BC). Jason, who supplanted his brother Onias in the office of high priest by promising Antiochus an increase of tribute, aided the movement by setting up under the king's authority a Gr palaestra for the training of youth in Gr exercises, and by registering the inhabitants of Jerus as citizens of Antioch (2 Macc 4 8 f). Certain of these Antiochians of Jerus Jason sent to Tyre, where games were held every five years in honor of Hercules, that is, the national Tyrian deity Melcart, identified with Baal of OT history. According to Jos (Ant, VII, v, 3) Hiram, king of Tyre in the days of Solomon, built the temple of Hercules and also of Astarte. Jason's deputies carried 300 drachmas of silver for the sacrifice of Hercules, but they were so ashamed of their commission that they "thought it not right to use the money for any sacrifice," and "on account of present circumstances it went to the equipment of the galleys" (2 Macc 4 18–20). J. Hutchison

HERD, hûrd. See Cattle.

HERDSMAN, hûrdz′man (בּוֹקֵר, bōḳer; AV, ERV "herdman"): A cowherd (Am 7 14). The same word is used in Syria today. רֹעֶה, rō'eh, has its equivalent in the language of Syria and Pal (Arab. ra'i), and is a general term for any kind of a herdsman (Gen 13 7.8; 26 20; 1 S 21 7). נֹקֵד, nōḳēdh, occurs in one passage (Am 1 1); lit. it means one who spots or marks the sheep, hence a herdsman. Spotting the wool with different dyes is still the method of distinguishing between the sheep of different flocks. The herdsman is seldom the owner of the sheep, but a hireling. See Sheep; Sheep Tending. James A. Patch

HERE, hēr, in composition:

Hereafter, hēr-aft′ẽr (here [this present] and after) represents Heb 'āḥar, "hinder part," "end" (Isa 41 23), "the things that are to come hereafter" ('āḥōr after, behind the present), with dēn, "this," 'aḥărē dhēn, Aram. (Dnl 2 29.45), 'aḥar, "after," "behind," "last" (Ezk 20 39), Gr ap' árti, "from now" (Mt 26 64), "Hereafter ye shall see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven," which does not mean "at a future time," according to the more modern usage of "hereafter," but (as the Gr) "from now," RV "henceforth"; Tindale and the chief VSS after him have "hereafter," but Wiclif has "fro hennes forth." Jn 1 51, "Hereafter ye shall see the heaven opened," etc, where "hereafter" has the same meaning; it is omitted by RV after a corrected text (Wiclif also omits); éti, "yet," "still," "any more," "any longer" (Jn 14 30, RV "I will no more speak much with you," Wiclif, "now I schal not"); mēkéti, "no more," "no longer" (Mk 11 14, "no man eat fruit of thee hereafter," RV "henceforward"); apó toú nún, "from now" (Lk 22 69, RV "From henceforth shall the Son of man be seated at the right hand of the power of God," Wiclif "aftir this tyme"); metá taúta (Jn 13 7, "Thou shalt know [RV "understand"] hereafter," Wiclif "aftirward").

Hereby, hēr-bī′, represents b^{e}zō'th, "in or by this" (Gen 42 15, "Hereby ye shall be proved"); ek toútou, "out of this" (1 Jn 4 6, RV "by this"); en toútō, "in this," "by this means" (1 Cor 4 4; 1 Jn 2 3.5; 3 16.19.24; 4 2.13).

Herein, hēr-in′, Heb b^{e}zō'th, "in" or "by this" (Gen 34 22, RV "on this condition"); en toútō (Jn 4 37; 9 30; 15 8; Acts 24 16; 2 Cor 8 10; 1 Jn 4 10.17).

Hereof, hēr-ov′, Gr haútē, "this" (Mt 9 26); hoútos, "this" (He 5 3, RV "thereof").

Heretofore, hēr-tōō-fōr′, Heb t^{e}mōl, "yesterday," "neither heretofore, nor since" (Ex 4 10; cf 5 7.8.14; Josh 3 4; Ruth 2 11); 'ethmōl shilshōm, "yesterday," "third day" (1 S 4 7, "There hath not been such a thing heretofore."

Hereunto, hēr-un-tōō′, Gr eis toúto, "unto," "with a view to this" (1 Pet 2 21, "For hereunto were ye called"): "hereunto" is supplied (Eccl 2 25, "Who else can hasten hereunto more than I," RV "who can have enjoyment," m "hasten thereto").

Herewith, hēr-with′, Heb bā-zō'th, bᵉzō'th, "in," "by," or "with this" (Ezk 16 29; Mal 3 10, "Prove me now herewith, saith Jeh").

RV has "herein" for "to do this" (Ezr 4 22); for "in these things" (Rom 14 18); "of them that have sinned heretofore" for "which have sinned already" (2 Cor 12 21); "hereunto" for "thereunto" (1 Pet 3 9); "herewith" for "thus" (Lev 16 3).

HEREDITY, hḗ-red′i-ti: Heredity, in modern language, is the law by which living beings tend to repeat their characteristics, physiological and psychical, in their offspring, a law familiar in some form to even the most uncultured peoples. The references to it in the Bible are of various kinds.

1. Physiological Heredity

Curiously enough, little mention is made of physiological heredity, even in so simple a form as the resemblance of a son to his father, but there are a few references, such as, e.g., those to giants with giants for sons (2 S 21 18–22; 1 Ch 20 4–8; cf Gen 6 4; Nu 13 33; Dt 1 28, etc). Moreover Dt 28 59–61 may contain a thought of hereditary diseases (cf 2 K 5 27). On the psychical side the data are almost equally scanty. That a son and his father may differ entirely is taken for granted and mentioned repeatedly (esp. in Ezk 18 5–20). Even in the case of the king, the frequent changes of dynasty prevented such a phrase as "the seed royal" (2 K 11 1; Jer 41 1) from being taken very seriously. Yet, perhaps, the inheritance of mechanical dexterity is hinted at in Gen 4 20–22, if "father" means anything more than "teacher." But, in any case, the fact that "father" could have this metaphorical sense, together with the corresponding use of "son" in such phrases as "son of Belial" (Jgs 19 22 AV), "son of wickedness" (Ps 89 22), "sons of the prophets" (Am 7 14 m, etc), "son of the wise, ... of ancient kings" (Isa 19 11; this last phrase may be meant literally), shows that the inheritance of characteristics was a very familiar fact. See Son.

2. Hebrew Conception of Heredity

The question, however, is considerably complicated by the intense solidarity that the Hebrews ascribed to the family. The individual was felt to be only a link in the chain, his "personality" (very vaguely conceived) somehow continuing that of his ancestors and being continued in that of his descendants. After death the happiness (or even existence; see Death) of this shade in the other world depended on the preservation of a posterity in this. Hence slaying the sons of a dead man was thought to affect him directly, and it would be a great mistake to suppose that an act such as that of 2 S 21 1–9, etc, was simply to prevent a blood-feud. Nor was it at all in point that the children might repeat the qualities of the father, however much this may have been realized in other connections. Consequently, it is impossible to tell in many cases just how much of a modern heredity idea is present.

The most important example is the conception of the position of the nations. These are traced back to single ancestors, and in various cases the qualities of the nation are explained by those of the ancestor (Gen 9 22–27; 21 20.21; 49, etc). The influences that determine national characteristics are evidently thought to be hereditary, and yet not all of them are hereditary in our sense; e.g. in Gen 27, the condition of the descendants of Jacob and Esau is conceived to have been fixed by the nature of the blessings (mistakenly) pronounced by Isaac. On the other hand, Ezra (9 11.12) thinks of the danger of intermarrying with the children of a degenerate people in an entirely modern style, but in Dt 23 3–6 the case is not so clear. There a curse pronounced on the nations for their active hostility is more in point than moral degeneracy (however much this may be spoken of elsewhere, Nu 25 1–3, etc), and it is on account of the curse that the taint takes ten generations to work itself out, while, in the case of Edomite or Egyp blood, purity was attained in three. Hence it is hard to tell just how Ex 20 5.6 was interpreted. The modern conception of the effect of heredity was surely present in part, but there must have been also ideas of the extension of the curse-bearing individuality that we should find hard to understand.

3. Abraham's Children

The chiefest question is that of the Israelites. Primarily they are viewed as the descendants of Abraham, blessed because he was blessed (Gen 22 15–18, etc). This was taken by many with the utmost literalness, and physical descent from Abraham was thought to be sufficient (esp. Mt 3 9; Jn 8 31–44; Rom 9 6–13), or at least necessary (esp. Ezr 2 59; 9 2; Neh 7 61), for salvation. Occasionally this descent is stated to give superior qualities in other regards (Est 6 13). But a distinction between natural inheritance of Abraham's qualities and the blessing bestowed by God's unbounded favor and decree on his descendants must have been thoroughly recognized, otherwise the practice of proselytizing would have been impossible.

4. Heredity and the NT

In the NT the doctrine of original sin, held already by a certain school among the Jews (2 Esd 7 48), alone raises much question regarding heredity (cf 1 Cor 7 14). Otherwise the OT concepts are simply reversed: where likeness of nature appears, there is (spiritual) descent (Rom 4 12; Gal 3 7, etc). None the less, that the Israel "after the flesh" has a real spiritual privilege is stated explicitly (Rom 3 1.2; 11 26; Rev 11 13). See Blessing; Curse; Family; Salvation; Sin; Tradition.

HERES, hē′rēz, hē′res:

(1) הַר־חֶרֶס, har-ḥereṣ, "Mount Heres" (Jgs 1 34 f), a district from which the Amorites were not expelled; it is mentioned along with Aijalon and Shallbim. In Josh 19 41 f we have then two towns in association with Ir-shemesh and many authorities consider that as ḥereṣ=shemesh, i.e. the sun, and הַר, har, being perhaps a copyist's error for עִיר, 'īr, "city," we have in Jgs 1 34 a reference to Beth-shemesh, the modern 'Ain Shems. Conder thinks that Batn Harâsheh, N.E. of Aijalon, a prominent hill, may be the place referred to. Budde thinks Har-heres may be identified with the Bit-Ninib (Ninib being the fierce morning sun) of the Am Tab; this place was in the district of Jerus.

(2) מַעֲלֵה הֶחָרֶס, ma'ălēh he-ḥāreṣ, "the ascent of Heres" (Jgs 8 13, AV "before the sun was up"), the place from which Gideon returned to Succoth after his defeat of Zebah and Zalmunna. RV is probably a great improvement on AV, but both the text and the topography are uncertain.

(3) עִיר הַחֶרֶס, 'īr ha-ḥereṣ, "City of Heres" EVm, "City of Destruction" (חֶרֶם, ḥerem) EV, or "City of the sun" (חֶרֶס, ḥereṣ) EVm. This is the name of one of the "five cities in the land of Egypt that speak the language of Canaan, and swear to Jeh of hosts" (Isa 19 18). See Ir-ha-heres.
